Alas! who shall place limits to the wanderings of the human mind—effects, at once, of its weakness and of its strength! It is fearful to look upon it in these impious excesses. Well may the divines of Oxford protest against the name of Protestant! Well may they claim to be Reformed, not Protestant!|| But it is easier to disclaim the title than to disprove the consistency of its exercise: and it will be difficult, not to say impossible, to show the determined Rationalist that, while he is at liberty to reject the authority of the ancient church, he can be bound to submit his judgment, and close his eyes in obedience, to that of the Church of England, or any other authority upon earth. "Prove to me," said Rousseau, "that in matters of faith I am to follow any authority, and I shall be a Catholic to-morrow;" and a very slight acquaintance with the high-church controversy in England will attest the truth of Uytendbogard's memorable declaration: "They who discard this principle, and require unqualified submission to their synods, place themselves in a position in which they shall not be able to make a satisfactory reply to the Catholic's question, 'why they refuse to admit the Catholic councils?' and shall be compelled eventually to give up the case as lost."

Idle have been the attempts to stay this levelling spirit by the adoption of creeds and confessions. The attempt was irreconcilable with the first principles of Protestantism; and, by aiming at too much, defeated its own object. The disaffected never failed to meet it with the ready retort:

"However unquestionable the liberty of belief may be in the Protestant Church, as far as principles go, in practice it is miserably restricted. 'Tis true the Protestants have not a Pope; but, what is far worse, they have Popes. Protestant consistories equivalently supply the place of popes. 'Liberty,' say they, 'must not be abused: the church does not dictate to us, as with the Catholics, what we are to believe; we dictate it to the church; not according to our own caprice, but as it is clearly expressed in the Bible, which in matters of religion we hold to be the only fountain of knowledge.' And the church of every particular district must hear what is dictated. Each individual preacher is not permitted the free use of his reason in examining the Scripture. Whoever will venture to use it, as I have done, will forthwith be deprived of his charge, and taught what true Protestant liberty is."*—p. 81.

LEEDS.—THE CATHOLICS AND THE BIBLE.

A recent article in the Leeds Mercury has induced the Rev. George Keasley, Catholic pastor of St. Patrick's, in that town, to publish the following letter, which the editors of the Mercury say they "feel it not only a duty, but a very great satisfaction to place before their readers":—"St. Patrick's, July 11, 1844. Gentlemen—I beg to deny that the Catholic Church prohibits the use of the Sacred Scriptures to her people, as commonly asserted to be the case, and as conveyed in your remarks last week on the Pope's bull. I am not going to dispute with you about words, neither shall I make any observations on the document in question. I shall deal with facts—things as they are here at home. It is the opinion of hundreds here in England that Catholic priests do not allow their people to read the Holy Scriptures. But what are the facts bearing on the case? 1. It is notorious that there exist Catholic editions of the Holy Scriptures, and that their circulation has considerably increased during the last few years. 2. Besides several cheap editions printed some time ago in Ireland, there is the much-talked-of one which Father Mathew has interested himself in getting up, "an authorised edition" for general use, but especially, if I remember rightly, for the use of Temperance Societies. 3. It is a fact, not sufficiently known, that Catholic priests do allow their people to have Bibles, and that they personally assist in procuring them. Now, if the decrees about the Holy Scriptures of long standing and now confirmed by his present Holiness, did prohibit their use by the laity, as asserted here in England, none of these things would be. Hence, what we have to complain of in you, gentlemen, is, that you so brought the subject before your readers, as to strengthen the vulgar opinion, and to propagate the calumny, that we priests are withholding from our people the written word of God; when all the time you knew that the Holy Scriptures have been and are printed, circulated, and read, with the full sanction of our bishops, which bishops are in strict communion with the Holy See. This is not, gentlemen, quite as it should be. I beg you will put me to the test, as I presume to put you, by requesting from you a supply of copies of the Holy Scriptures, for the use of my poor people—observing one condition, that they be of a Catholic edition, and authorised. By having them many could read over again at home, the portion which is read and expounded to them at our early service on the Sunday mornings. The Catholic Church has always been most watchful in preserving the Sacred Scriptures from profanation, and such has always been the respect shown them, that many have never read them EXCEPT ON BENDED KNEES, and with fervent prayer to comprehend the hallowed sense. If similar precautions were taken in other quarters, we should not find Bibles where we do. We should not hear of men, unconscious of the least impropriety, giving to the world such specimens as the following:—"Resolved—That the Valley of the Mississippi is part of the territory between the river and the ends of the earth (Ps. lxxii. 8, Zech. ix. 10) which belongs to Jesus Christ, by express grant from Almighty God, and that Jesus Christ must have it!" This was adopted, nem. con., says the paper, in a respectable assembly, lay and clerical, the elite. I trust, gentlemen, your love and respect for the Holy Scriptures render you as far from approving of this as you must be from approving of other late transatlantic demonstrations.—I am, gentlemen, respectfully yours, GEO. KEASLEY."—CALUMNIES of Mr. E. BAINES of the Leeds Mercury, on the Catholic Church and her Pontiff.—Sir,—Doubtless you are acquainted with the existence of the Leeds Mercury, a weekly newspaper of great circulation, and generally conducted with an ability which, were it not too often prostituted to Whig party purposes and sectarian acrimony, would exercise very considerable influence on the public mind. It is the property of Mr. Baines, who so very creditably filled the post of representative of Leeds in Parliament, and has for some time been edited by Mr. Edward Baines, jun., son of that gentleman. In that publication of the 6th appeared, in the shape of strictures on the late circular of the Pope against the Bible Societies, a most intemperate article, denouncing his Holiness as entirely suppressing the use of translations of the Scriptures, and the Catholic Church as, semper eadem, the everlasting enemy of their diffusion, with the very sage addition—that this constant prohibition of the Word of God was one of the strongest proofs of the little confidence Catholics had in their own belief!... In the Mercury of the 13th appeared a short letter from the Rev. George Keasley, of Leeds, showing simply that in this country English versions of the Scriptures were in general use among Catholics; to which Mr. E. Baines, in his editorial remarks, retorted that this, if continued, would be in defiance of the Pope's Bull, as he designated his Holiness's Circular. The enclosed letter, sent by me to Mr. Baines, jun., was refused insertion on the flimsy pretext that he had given Mr. Keasley's letter (which entered not, beyond the statement of one fact, into a refutation of Mr. Baines' calumnies;) and in his note, returning my manuscript, he tells me, that though, "he will not enter into controversy with Catholics," he shall, "whenever the Pope takes the field against one of the most excellent and useful societies the world ever saw, the Bible Society, exercise his right as a public journalist in making such comments on the Pope's Bulls, as his love of the Holy Scriptures and of truth dictates"! Yet, Sir, "his love of truth and Scripture" manifests itself in the present instance by misleading his readers with the grossest calumnies; and then, when the refutation of them, by reference to historical facts, is put into his hands, refusing to publish it, and leaving his misrepresentations to rankle in the public mind! This liberal Editor would surely do well to inform us why his Holiness and the Cardinals he consulted may not be as correct in believing this self-established Bible Society to be an impertinent and mischievous intermeddler in other people's concerns, as he himself is in believing it worthy of his exalted praise. How, without asserting his own infallibility, he can deny this possibility, whilst he claims for himself the right of private interpretation of Scripture, is not so very clear; unless, as one of "our best possible instructors," he deems himself as, officio peritus, qualified to enlighten the world, de omnibus rebus et quibusdam aliis! It might be well, then, if he informed us how it happens that the Protestant Bible-reading countries of Sweden, Prussia, and England are, by writers of their own faith, described as the most immoral of the nations of Europe; why in the supereminently Bible-reading West Riding of Yorkshire there exists a perpetual necessity for adding new wings to our lunatic asylum and for building and enlarging jails; and whether or no it was from "a love of the Holy Scriptures and of truth" that the unrestricted Bible-reading ruffians of Charleston deliberately turned helpless and unoffending women out of their convent, and those of Philadelphia reduced to ashes the temples of their fellow-Christians. As to his future hostility, his Holiness must look to himself! and we can only humbly pray that the Vatican may not fall by the tiny thunder of Mr. E. Baines's indignation, nor St. Peter's, after withstanding the enmity of so many ages, be at length subverted by—what my friend Mr. Waterton has so happily termed—the muck-fork of the Whigs.—I am, Sir, your faithful and obedient servant, JOSEPH WOOD.—Sandal, July 22, 1844."—Tablet.

MISCELLANEA.

ADDRESS OF THE CORPORATIONS OF IRELAND TO THE PEOPLE.—"We, the undersigned Mayors, and other members of the municipal corporations of the under-named cities and towns of Ireland, have, in compliance with the wishes of our constituents and fellow-citizens, visited this metropolis for the purpose of paying our respects to Daniel O'Connell, and of conveying to him, by the presentation of the respective addresses confided to our charge, the assurance how deep and enduring is their gratitude to our illustrious countryman, and how great is their indignation at the personal insult received in his person. Though disappointed in the object of our Mission, we think that a moment of such intense interest—a crisis so important—which has brought together a large section of the popularly constituted authorities of this country, should not be permitted to pass without a solemn and deliberate declaration of our opinion on the present aspect of affairs in Ireland. Having consulted together to ascertain how far the state of public feeling in our different localities corresponds with the sentiments in the addresses entrusted to us, and having reviewed the proceedings connected with the State trials—commencing with the mysterious disappearance of Catholics from the panel, followed by the formation of a jury wholly exclusive in its character—this again succeeded by the novel application of the law of conspiracy, and the whole terminated by a sentence enforced in opposition to the opinion of a distinguished member of the Court of Queen's Bench in favour of a new trial, and in defiance of the declaration of eminent lawyers and statesmen in Ireland, that O'Connell had not a fair one—having thus reviewed these proceedings, vitiating as they do, in the eyes of the world, the verdict obtained, and making a martyr of Ireland's first citizens, we now put on record this solemn and conscientious declaration:—“That the State trials, and their result, have produced in the great communities with which we are connected, and throughout the whole country, a strong apprehension that life, liberty, and property cannot be safe as long as an administration so hostile to the national sentiment, and so obnoxious to the people, continues in power. That if anything could increase the popular exasperation it is this: that while, on the one hand, the most oppressive measures have been resorted to, under the forms of law—on the other, ministers have been deluding the Irish nation, by holding out, even in the Speech from the Throne, hopes of a just extension of its electoral rights, at the very time that they contemplate the introduction of the measure now before Parliament, which, if it become law, will almost annihilate the miserable franchise we possess. That an administration which has pledged itself to maintain in its full enormity the monster grievance of a Church establishment in Ireland can never be countenanced by the Irish people. That, notwithstanding much hollow professions, we see no attempt made to relieve the prevailing distress—we expect for the rack-rented tenantry no alleviation of their misery, nor for our starving labourers any general employment; and all that can be looked for from the boasted Land Commission of this anti-Irish Administration is a tardy report, from which no practical benefit is likely to arise. That while we thus deliberately declare our opinion that the continuance in power of the present Administration is irreconcilable with the well-being of Ireland—still we are daily more thoroughly convinced the liberties, the franchises, and the social prosperity of the people cannot be effectually or at all secured under any Administration, without giving to the Irish nation a participation in its government by the establishment of its own Parliament.”—[Here follow the signatures]—Mr. W. S. O'Brien having appealed to Sir J. Graham against the decision of the Governor of Richmond Penitentiary, in rejecting the deputation, the following reply:—“Whitehall, 1844. Sir—I beg leave to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 11th instant, as subject of the directions given by the of Superintendence of the Richmond Penitentiary, that no deputations should be admitted to present addresses to certain prisoners therein confined, and to acquaint you that, by law, the enforcement of the discipline of the Richmond Penitentiary is vested in the Board of Superintendence, and this board is not under the immediate control of the Secretary of State, and that I am not prepared to interfere with the discretion of the board on this occasion. I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant, JAMES GRAHAM.—W. S. O'Brien, Esq., M.P., Dublin.”—Tablet.

SPAIN.

“The Univers states that, under the administration of Gonzales Bravo, arrangements were made, and are now carrying out, for the sale of the relics of church property in Spain. An advertisement has appeared in the “Bulletin Official” of Barcelona, announcing the sale of two religious edifices—the College of the Trinitaires Chaussees and the Chapel of Saint Agnedia—The Chapel of St. Agnedia is the noblest historical monument of the crown of Arragon. It is in a rich and graceful style of architecture, and was in a Chapel royal in the times of the Kings of Arragon. It is at once a model of the state of art in the 13th century and a monument of national glories. The Ayuntamiento assembled on the 14th of May have addressed the Queen, demanding that these orders from the Minister of Finance should be annulled.”—Ibid.

AMERICA.

PROGRESS OF CATHOLICITY IN THE UNITED STATES.—The Catholic Herald of Philadelphia, of the 11th April, has the following:—“The Home Missionary gives an account of the progress of our religion in the United States, calling it Romanism and Popery, although it styles us Catholics. We have changed the offensive terms in the heading, and in the only passages of the article in which they occur, and omitted what relates to foreign supplies, which we cannot ascertain, but otherwise give unaltered (save ‘the sects’ for ‘other sects’) the original article, which possesses some interest:—‘The earliest Roman Catholics of this country were the colonists who, in 1634, accompanied Leonard Calvert, son of Lord Baltimore, to the colony of Maryland. The first company consisted of about two hundred. Smaller bodies occasionally found their way to the different settlements of the New World; but as they were not well received, especially by the other colonies, they seem to have increased very slowly. Among the laws promulgated by the Duke of York, was one commanding all Roman ecclesiastics to depart from the province of New York before 1600. Their religious teachers for more than a century were Jesuits, and almost all from abroad. In 1725 Catholicity began to appear in Pennsylvania, though its importance does not seem to have advanced in an equal ratio with that of the sects, since the consecration of the church of St. Augustine in Philadelphia, as late as 1800, is regarded by Holmes as an event worthy of insertion in his Annals. At the commencement of the revolutionary war, there were probably not more than twenty or thirty ecclesiastics in the whole country. The suppression of the Jesuits in 1773 had cut off the supply of Missionaries from that order; and the changes of feeling, resulting from the contest between Great Britain and the colonies, rendered it politic for the Catholics of America to have a hierarchy of their own. Instead, therefore, of a vicar of the Bishop of London, who had governed the churches since 1673, American prelates were designated in 1789, the first of whom, Bishop Carroll of Baltimore, was afterwards advanced to the Archiepiscopate. The establishment of American independence threw open a field most inviting to foreign emigrants, and the events of the war had heralded the attractions of this field to all the nations of Europe. A rapid increase of population from abroad at this time brought a proportional addition of Catholics. Arrangements were accordingly made to raise up priests for the increasing congregations. Accordingly, when, in 1796, the diocese of New Orleans was added to those of the United States, we find that there were already two colleges for general purposes, two seminaries for ecclesiastical training, and three convents. In 1799 another college was established. The priests now numbered forty-five. In the present century, the first political event which caused any considerable emigration of Catholics to America was the Irish rebellion. But what more contributed to this result was the increasing facilities and frequency of commercial intercourse between the old and new world. The operation of this cause was suspended for a short time during the war of 1812-15, but on the return of peace, it went on with redoubled activity. In 1810 Bishop Cheverus was ordained for Boston by Archbishop Carroll, making the fifth or sixth now belonging to the hierarchy of the United States.* From the peace of 1815 to the present time, the increase of the Catholic population has been prodigious. The ratio, it is believed, must have been greater than that of the Protestant population, since a very large share of the recent influx of foreigners are adherents to Rome. For various reasons this class of emigrants does not spread itself over the country and in the cultivation of the soil, but clusters around the seaports and larger inland towns, and along the lines of public improvement. Hence it is comparatively easy for them to be reached and controlled by a smaller number of religious teachers than other denominations. The same fact has also brought them into notice as occupying the most important localities; and has inspired their leaders with the hope of exerting an influence over the social interests of this country greater than their numbers or their individual intelligence and wealth would otherwise warrant them to expect. In 1830 the number of dioceses had increased to eleven; the priests to three hundred; the Catholic population to half a million; while, as the result of foreign sympathy, literary institutions of every grade were rapidly multiplied. From 1834 to 1844 the enlargement of Romish interests in this country has been astonishing. The population, from being 500,000, has become, according to general estimate, more than 1,000,000—some say 1,500,000. The priests have multiplied from 300 to 634; the dioceses have become 23 and the bishops 25—six having been added during the past year. All these items, therefore, have more than doubled in ten years."—Tablet.

PRIOR PARK.—RECEPTION OF THE BISHOP.—Bath, May 30.—The Right Rev. Dr. Baggs, Vicar Apostolic of the Western District, on Monday took possession of his college and district. His lordship arrived by the quarter past ten a.m. train, arriving in Bath at five minutes past two p.m., and immediately proceeded to Prior Park, where he was received at the entry into the beautiful grounds by a numerous procession of the pupils of the college and the clergy of the district, who preceded his lordship chanting the litanies and other sacred chants, till they arrived within the chapel of the college. After a considerable time spent in these devotions, the Bishop, seated in his episcopal chair, received the respects of each individual, first of the clergy, then of the members of the college, then of the lay gentlemen, whose religious devotion prompted them to attend on the occasion. Afterwards addresses were presented to his lordship, first from the Rev. Dr. Brindle, Regent of the college and V.G. of the District, welcoming his lordship to the college and district, alluding delicately to our late lamented prelate, and soliciting the patronage of his right rev. successor; then from the Rev. Mr. Wilson, Prior of the Benedictine College at Downside assuring his lordship of the devotion of that body. His lordship replied at considerable length. He much lamented the loss of his right reverend predecessor, both as a prelate much wanted in the present necessities of the Church, and as a personal friend, and his lordship added that it afforded him great consolation to reflect that he had been able to alleviate the trials which had afflicted his right reverend predecessor. He expressed great solicitude for the welfare of the college, which was an object of anxiety to all Catholic Europe, and great satisfaction at the address presented from the Benedictines. In conclusion, he imparted an indulgence of forty days to all present. The ceremony lasted till nearly five o'clock, and was followed by an excellent cold collation, after which Lord Clifford, in brief but very appropriate terms, proposed the health of the Bishop, which was very warmly received. His lordship, in few but expressive terms, returned thanks. The attendance of the clergy, the time of indulgence being considered, was numerous; of the laity, we noticed Right Hon. Lord Clifford, the personal friend of the late bishop and great patron of religion in the district as everywhere else; R. Berkeley, Esq., of whom may be said ditto; T. Eyre, Esq., Mr. Tancred, General Mauley, M. Mecham, E. King, &c. His lordship preached at the Chapel in Lower Berkeley-place, Clifton, on Sunday last. The Rev. Edward Metcalfe is the new priest at this mission. A Confirmation will be held in Bristol on the 30th instant.—Ibid.

Mgr. Dominic Benoit Balsanco, Archbishop of Monreale (in the Two Sicilies), President of the Commission of Public Instruction at Palermo, died there on the 6th of April.—Ibid.

A letter in the Allgemeine Zeitung, dated Vienna, April 5, states, that on the preceding day (Maunday-Thursdays, or, as the Germans call it,

* Bishops Flagg and Egan were consecrated for Bardonia and Philadelphia in the same year.

Grun Donnerstag), their Majesties the Emperor and Empress washed the feet of twelve aged men and twelve aged women, who after the ceremony were regaled with a dinner, and each received a present of new clothing. Of the men the oldest was 110 years of age, and the youngest 83; of the women the oldest was 106, and the youngest 84. The ceremony was, as usual, attended by a vast concourse of spectators.—Tablet.

A correspondent of the Ami de la Religion writes as follows from the Eternal City:—The New Basilica of St. Paul extra muros, is rising by degrees from the great disaster by which it was destroyed from the very foundation on the fatal night of July 15th, 1828. It will not be among the least of the glories acquired by Pope Gregory XVI. to have carried on the work with so much activity, and so many generous sacrifices that, so long ago as four years since, the transverse nave was solemnly blessed by him and restored to the holy ceremonies of worship. The eye is dazzled by the magnificence of the gilding and by the resplendant richness of the marbles in this extensive portion of the new church; but the grand altar raised above the confession, to which the sacred relics of the great Apostles have been restored, must chiefly delight the Christian. On the anniversary of the feast of St. Paul each year, the Pope has imposed on himself the pious duty of going to visit the tomb which his hands have rescued from the midst of ruins, and restored to the veneration of the Catholic world. On the 30th of last month the worthy successor of St. Gregory the Great, by whom the feast of the Commemoration of St. Paul was instituted, repaired, as usual, to the Basilica, dedicated to the illustrious Apostle of the Gentiles. His Holiness was received at the gate of the adjoining Monastery by the cardinals who form part of the special commission that presides over the works of the reconstruction; and after adoring the Holy Sacrament in the chapel on the left of the abside, the Holy Father, assisted by two bishops and Cardinal Mattei, celebrated a Low Mass at the altar of the confession, near which he subsequently continued for a long time prostrate in deep recollection, his prayers mingled with pious tears. After the solemn Mass, which was chaunted by the Patriarch of Constantinople, and at which the King of Bavaria and his suite, several cardinals, the dignitaries of the Pontifical Court, and a great number of personages who appeared to belong to the nobility of Rome and foreign countries, assisted, the Sovereign Pontiff retired to the interior of the convent in the midst of the Benedictine Monks, who, in the presence of the illustrious members of that commission, laid at his feet the homage of their lively gratitude and profound veneration.—Ibid.

HOLY PROFESSION OF A SISTER OF MERCY AT THE CONVENT OF MERCY, BERMONDSEY.—On Monday, the 22nd instant, Miss Ann Margaret Duff, daughter of James Charles Duff, Esq., of Lisbon, made her vows to the Lord in the sight of all the people, and thus dedicated herself to the faithful performance of those holy exercises of mercy and love to which our Blessed Saviour has promised eternal life.—Ibid.

A CURIOUS RELIC.—The Prussian Gazette states that a young woman of Kaina, who was travelling with her master's family, found on the road to Bautzen a ring set in rubies, which had on one side a representation in relief of Christ on the Cross, and on the other the instruments of punishment. The ring bears this inscription—"Martino Luther, Catherina V. Boren, die 31 October, 1625." The ring, which is well preserved, is a perfect model of art.—Tablet.

KIDDERMINSTER.—On Sunday last the Right Rev Dr. Wiseman confirmed thirty persons at the chapel here, eight of whom were converts, one the daughter of a clergyman in the Establishment.—Ibid.

At the Bavarian Chapel, Warwick-street, a solemn dirge was, on Thursday last, the 4th instant, sung for the repose of the soul of Barbara Lady de Mauley. Among those present were Lord de Mauley, Lady Kinnaird, the Honourable Charles and Lady Maria Ponsonby, Colonel and Lady Dorothea Leslie, Philip Howard, Esq., M.P., and Mrs. Howard, of Corby: the Honourable William Browne, M.P., and the O'Connor Don, &c. &c.—Ibid.

THE NORMAN PEASANT'S HYMN TO THE VIRGIN.

BY WILLIAM JONES.

(From Bentley's Miscellany for August.)

Hope of the faithful! behold us now bending,
 Submissive, contrite, at thy footstool of love;
 The tears of thy children repentant are blending,
 Oh! plead for their help in thy kingdom above,
 Thou canst each bosom see,
 May it more sinless be,
 Ave Maria,
 To glorify thee!

We are defenceless without thy protection,
 To watch o'er our night, and to shield us by day,
 And 'tis to the warmth of thy care and affection,
 Our thoughts are more hallow'd, our feet less astray.

Thou canst each bosom see,
 May it more sinless be,
 Ave Maria,
 To glorify thee!

Be thou our comfort, when shaded by sorrow,
 For weak are the tendrils we cling to below;
 As night is subdued in the dawn of a morrow, Illume with thy brightness the depths of our woe!

Thou canst each bosom see,
 May it more sinless be,
 Ave Maria,
 To glorify thee!

Through the dim valley our vespers are pealing,
 Borne on the winds to a sunnier sphere;
 While yon star that lonely the skies are revealing, Doth tell in its beaming thou hearest our prayer.

Thou canst each bosom see,
 May it more sinless be,
 Ave Maria,
 To glorify thee!

FEVER HOSPITAL.

Our readers will peruse with pleasure the subjoined correspondence between our venerated Archbishop and Doctor Mount, Secretary to the Council of Education, on the important subject of the erection of a Fever Hospital for the Native community. The very satisfactory letters we annex, render it unnecessary for us to enter on this topic in detail, farther than simply to state, that we fully and cordially concur in the sentiments expressed by the Archbishop, and also by the respected and talented Secretary to the Council of Education. We have been favoured with a copy of the Pamphlet to which the following correspondence makes reference, and, according as opportunity permits, we shall submit some extracts from it to the notice of our readers.

These extracts will show, that it is the interest of every family in Calcutta to contribute according to their ability to the erection of the proposed Institution, not only on the score of humanity, but even out of regard to their own health and that of their children and friends.

TO THE RIGHT REV. DR. CAREW,
Vicar Apostolic.

MY LORD,—I am directed by the Council of Education to forward for your information the accompanying published statement respecting the proposed Establishment of a Fever Hospital, in connection with the Medical College, pointing out the large amount of mortality and sickness, existing among the Native Community, the present very inadequate means of ministering to their wants, and the steps which have already been taken in the matter, consequent on the presentation of a piece of ground adjoining the Medical College, and the transfer of the Funds at present in the possession of the Fever Hospital Committee. These are not only utterly inadequate to provide a building of the nature and extent required, which it is estimated cannot cost less than a lac of Rupees, but a further sum of nearly Company's Rupees 40,000 will be necessary to purchase the additional ground essential for free ventilation on all sides. On this account the Council of Education are induced to place the present appeal in the hands of the clergy, for the purpose of aiding them to raise funds to accomplish so great and good an object.

During the late epidemic visitations of Small Pox, Fever, and Cholera, it is well known that among the lower classes of the Native population the mortality was unusually severe, and the means of alleviating their distress or treating their diseases, quite inadequate to the demands for succour, so that the Moslem burying grounds were crowded with mourners, the Hindoo ghâts choked with the bodies of the dead accumulated for burning, and many of the poorer members of the Christian Community suffered from the same causes.

Dispensaries were established by Government in various part of the town, to receive small pox patients, but not until the ravages of the disorder had been widely extended and the confidence of natives in the means provided for their relief completely destroyed, from having no asylum (except the Police Hospital, a very inadequate and ineligible one)* to receive them while labouring under the disease, so that few ultimately resorted to them and they made little impression upon the epidemic itself.

I was myself reluctantly compelled to refuse admission to the College Hospital to many sufferers brought to my own door in an advanced stage of the disease, because we have no fever wards, and introducing contagious diseases into a general medical and surgical Hospital, would only have increased instead of diminishing the mortality.

In Great Britain a very large proportion of the funds raised for the support of such charities is by the means of sermons preached in churches for such objects, and the community is seldom backward in responding to such appeals. In the present case the appeal would not be for the maintenance and support but merely for the building of such an Institution, and therefore not likely to be repeated. The advantages to every class of the community would be great from such an establishment. It would relieve the suffering poor of this great city, enable families at once to send their servants and poor retainers without expense, when afflicted with severe and contagious forms of disease: and would then leave disposable our present Male Hospital for poor Europeans and Christians of all denominations, whom we could admit upon emergency to the number of 112, with the means now at our command, whereas in the General Hospital they are obliged to pay a certain sum daily while under treatment.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obdt. servant,

F. J. MOUTAT, M. D.

*Council of Education, } Secretary.
September 3d, 1844. }*

To F. J. MOUTAT, Esq. M. D.

Secretary to the Council of Education.

SIR,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th Sept. and to state, in answer to that communication, that it will give me great pleasure to co-operate with the Council of Education in the accomplishment of the very benevolent object they have in view, in undertaking to erect a Fever Hospital for the Native community of Calcutta. As it appears to me, that the most useful way in which I can give my assistance towards the furtherance of the wishes of the Council is, to induce the Catholic Clergy and Laity of Bengal to take a becoming interest in a matter of such importance, I beg to forward a copy of the Circular, which I propose to forward to each of the Reverend Gentlemen of this Vicariate. On their zealous co-operation in this good work, as well as on that of their respective flocks, I can rely with confidence. But, to guard against too sanguine anticipations of the result, it is right to add, that, in general, the Catholics of Bengal are by no means affluent; on the contrary they are, for the most part, in very moderate circumstances, and are enabled to provide for their families, only by great industry and economy. Add to this, that as Government gives no assistance towards supplying their religious or educational wants, and as all the Schools or orphanages endowed by Government are based on principles incompatible with their religion, they have, out of their small means, to contribute constantly, to the support of their Clergy and of the Schools and Charitable Institutions established for the youth and the destitute members of their communion, in Calcutta and its vicinity. Yet, notwithstanding these difficulties, such is their zeal in every good work, proposed by their chief Pastor, that, in no single instance, have I appealed to their charity, in which their generosity has not exceeded my warmest expectations. On such an occasion as the present, one in which they have every incentive, both spiritual and temporal, to urge them to liberality, they will not surely evince an indifference unworthy of the high reputation for charity they have justly earned, not only among their brethren in India, but also among their fellow Christians in China, in the Cape of Good Hope, in Singapore and in Gwalior,—for to their suffering brethren in all these remote countries, have they, within the last year or two, sent assistance, cordially and generously. Indeed, a month has not yet elapsed, since I received a letter from the Holy See, in which the successor of St. Peter expresses his paternal joy, at the tidings conveyed to him, of the active and beneficent sympathy evinced by my beloved flock, for the cause of charity throughout the regions I have enumerated. It would be an injustice to them to suppose, even for an instant, that whilst they are so commendably alive to the wants of their fellow creatures in distant countries, they could look with indifference on the sufferings of others with whom they are linked, in some cases, by the bond of common religion, and in all by the sacred ties of country or humanity, or of that almost parental relationship, which binds the Master and Mistress to those of their own household; of this latter tie, in particular, it is written, if any man do not take care of his own household, he hath denied the faith, and he is worse than an Infidel. Now, how can a man be said to take care of those of his own household, if he cast off his servants in the hour of sickness, at the very time when they stand most in need of his kind attention and indulgence?

With sincere wishes, that the grand cause, in which you, Sir, have taken so distinguished and so very useful a part, may be blessed with success by Divine Providence, I have the honor to be,

Sir,
Your most Obdt. Servt.

Circular to the Catholic Clergy of Bengal.

TO THE REV. ———

Calcutta, 14th October, 1844.

REV. DEAR SIR,—I have the pleasure to forward to you a Copy of a very interesting pamphlet, on the subject of the erection of a Fever Hospital in connection with the Medical College. Of the necessity of such an Institution for Calcutta, you will be fully convinced by the perusal of that publication. In a merely temporal or social point of view, it is obvious, that the establishment of a Fever Hospital for the Native Community, would confer great benefits, not only on the Native Community, but also on the British and Indo-British Inhabitants of Calcutta. If viewed in a religious light, it is undoubtedly an imperative duty enjoined by Christianity on its professors, to contribute to the relief of their suffering fellow-creatures, of every creed and country, according to the means with which God has blessed them. In the present case, this obligation is peculiarly binding, because a great number of those, whom it is sought to relieve, are the servants of Christian masters and mistresses, and as such have very strong claims, when they suffer from sickness, on the charity of their employers. Now the establishment of a Fever Hospital on the large scale contemplated by the benevolent proposers of that measure, supplies at once both the most economical and the only adequate means for a Christian master, or mistress, to provide for the care of Native servants in time of sickness. In such an Asylum, conducted according to the liberal and enlightened principle on which the proposed Institution is to be based, every deference will be paid to the religious, and, if I may so call them, the civil or social notions, or prejudices of all classes of the Native population, whilst, at the same time, every attention will be paid by professional gentlemen, distinguished alike for their great skill and humanity, to the medical treatment of those confided to their care. It is not, I trust, too much to anticipate, that by lending our exertions to the furtherance of a cause, in which the interests of charity are so deeply concerned, we shall even contribute much to create a favorable disposition on the part of the Natives towards the Christian religion, a disposition which, with the aid of education and of the Divine blessing, will in time conduce greatly to the dissemination of the true faith throughout Bengal.

Neither should it be forgotten, that by occasion of the proposed Institution, considerable additional accommodation will be afforded in the Medical College Hospital, to poor Christian patients. I need not inform you, Rev. Sir, that, for the most part, the poor of the Christian Community in Calcutta consist of Catholics, and that we cannot be censured, if, whilst we sincerely labor to procure relief for our fellow-creatures of other persuasions, we show a feeling solicitude for those of the same household of faith, to which we have the happiness to belong.

Having briefly pointed out the numerous advantages, which there is every reason to hope the erection of a Fever Hospital will confer on Calcutta, permit me now, Rev. Sir, to recommend earnestly to you, to form, in your district, with as little delay as possible, a Committee of four or five of the influential Members of your flock, for the purpose of adopting, in concert with them, such measures as will be likely to obtain the most prompt and efficient encouragement for the proposed undertaking. In the parish annexed to the Cathedral, it is my intention, to act upon this plan, and to employ the good offices of the Lay Gentlemen of the Committee to collect subscriptions in this district, and of the Clergy of the Cathedral to encourage, by their pious exhortations from the pulpit, the faithful under their care to second cheerfully and liberally the exertions of the Committee. As far as circumstances may permit, I would be glad that a similar course of proceeding were adopted by you, and that the sums collected should be immediately transmitted to Doctor Mouat, Secretary to the Council of Education. With sincere esteem, I remain, Rev. Dear Sir,

Your's faithfully, in Christ,

"SCHISM IN THE PAPACY."

A short time ago, the Englishman favoured his readers with the following pithy paragraph.

"In the Quarterly Review (June) is an article headed "Schism in the Papacy," and the reviewer describes it as a Schism "which must soon produce a division among the members of the Church of Rome, similar to that which has just taken place in the Church of Scotland." To our thinking, it will be even wider and more disruptive; but we shall not enter into the discussion of it, though as a "great fact," we give notice to our Roman Catholic readers, many of the LAITY among whom may not yet have heard that such a Schism has begun in Germany. The four points upon which the reformers insist are, according to the Quarterly, 'first, that the public worship shall be performed in all countries in the vernacular tongue; secondly, that the cup shall be given, as well as the bread, in the sacrament to the laity; thirdly, that the frequenting of the confessional shall not be compulsory; fourthly, that vows of celibacy shall not be obligatory on the clergy.' These points, together, will form a wedge which, if driven home to the papacy by the united strength of a large section, will split in two."

As it was to be expected the item was "cheering" to the only Christian Journal in Calcutta,—need we name it?—the Calcutta Christian Advocate, the Editor of which paper introduced the paragraph with his usual flourish "against the senseless mummeries and arrogant assumptions of the Pope and his priesthood" and such other clap-trap fooleries.

Let the Editors of the Englishman and Christian Advocate, read the following notice by the Tablet of the article in the Quarterly Review, and, if consistent with their notions of justice, transfer it to their columns with a view to disabuse the minds of their readers—:

The just published number of the Quarterly Review contains a short but infamous article under this portentous title. Prince Hal compares Falstaff's lies, for magnitude and grossness, to the father that begot them; and if in this instance we may adopt the same rule and reason from the review to the Reviewer, we have no alternative but to conclude that this wielder of the critical pen is indeed "a huge bed-prester." His lies, at all events, are of the very largest and grossest dimensions, and are told with a boldness and a gusto that "would do honour to a better cause."

The lax and lamentable condition into which in many parts of Germany religious Faith has been sunk by the long-continued operation of so many adverse circumstances influencing in their youth the minds of the generation now arrived at maturity, is well known. That the German soil has contained for some time past many elements of an unpropitious character, no one who has heard of the University of Bonn, of Professor Hermes, and the entire story of Mgr. Droste's persecution, can be supposed ignorant. That the enemies of religion should gloat over these circumstances; should busy themselves in putting together auguries of evil out of them; and in connection with these things, should return—like a dog to his vomit—to the old story of "the Filth of the confessional," is by no means to be wondered at; but that such a galaxy, such a perfect milky way of broad, thumping falsehoods, should be packed so very close as we here find them, is perhaps rather astonishing.

The Reviewer sets out with informing us that the anti-Catholic spirit which the Archbishop of Cologne has done so much to suppress and discredit, has been making great head lately; and that the virtuous clerical reformers by whom it is countenanced are resolved not to hear of any "discussion of, or departure from, any one doctrine or article of faith," but are determined coolly to commit the sin of schism with their eyes open to the magnitude of their guilt, in order to correct certain things which they dislike in the present ecclesiastical discipline. When this story is reduced to its naked dimensions it amounts to this: These virtuous reformers take it for an article of Faith that out of the Roman communion there is no salvation; they are resolved not to have this or any other article of Faith interfered with; but yet they are resolved to renounce the communion of the Holy See, and their hopes of salvation at the same time, out of a pure zeal for the reformation of abuses. In other words, these worthies have come to the conclusion to make over their souls to the devil as a preliminary to the more perfect service of Almighty God.

If the Reviewer had told us that his German friends, disgusted with the corruptions of the Church, had, through this disgust, been induced to open their eyes to the untruth of the Catholic tenets, and to that of the Papal Supremacy among the rest, he would at least have had the merit of putting forward a consistent, and, in the eyes of some people, a plausible statement. But to say that they will jealously maintain every, the least tittle of the Faith, at the very time they have come to the resolution of rebelling against a very important article of faith, is to pronounce at once that they are either insane or else wicked and coldblooded deceivers.

The four points, it seems, upon which they insist are (1) public worship in the vernacular; (2) the cup to the laity; (3) "that the frequenting of the Confessional shall not be compulsory;" (4) that the clergy shall not be bound to celibacy.

The reader has seen that these Reformers, who will not touch a hair of the Faith, are yet ready to renounce one of its prime articles. Here he has another parallel instance. The Catholic Faith teaches us that the Confessional was made obligatory by God; and that not as a rule of discipline, but by His appointment the Confessional, in the ordinary course of things is the only method of procuring forgiveness for mortal sins committed after Baptism. This is of Faith; and every article of Faith the new German Reformers will jealously adhere to but yet they will rebel against the superior they believe to be placed over them by God, unless that superior consents to abolish a sacrament which they believe God himself has instituted. For shame, Reviewer! In any case, tell a consistent lie if possible, and not such obvious dishonest drivelling as this.

However, the Reviewer proceeds to examine in succession these four points.

(1.) Public worship in the vernacular. "They," that is, the German Catholic Reformers, "complain (says the Reviewer)

That this particular law against vernacular prayer has been relaxed elsewhere—but not for them. In France the people commonly use a prayer-book called the "Paroissien," which has the Latin service and the French translation in parallel columns; but such a work is prohibited in Italy, Spain, Portugal, and all countries where the power of the Church is absolute. In the North of Germany and the Tyrol they use a German Mass-book, but it is rarely to be met with in Austria, Bohemia, or Styria. Nor let it not be supposed that this is a question affecting the laity only; a large majority of the priests in these regions are as ignorant of the meaning of the Latin which they chaunt, as the Jew are of the Hebrew which they read in the Synagogue. Jews and Romish priests learn to read Hebrew and Latin, but they do not learn to understand it; even in the towns, to say nothing of the country parishes, very many priests understand no more of Latin than the people; and hence the importance even as respects the clergy, of this first point for which they are contending

It is difficult to know how to set about unravelling this tangle of falsehoods. Every person of common information knows that the Holy See has ten times as much direct power in France, where the Reviewer admits the existence of vernacular Missals, as in Austria, Bohemia, and Styria, where he says they are not to be found. The power of the Holy See in Austria is, we hope, real in its existence, but in its exercise it is notoriously only nominal. And if there are no "German Mass books" in Austria, the fault lies entirely in its own hands. These are facts of which the most ignorant cannot be ignorant.

But the climax of the Reviewer's dishonesty is to be found in this; that, thanks to the reforming propensities of the Emperor Joseph, Austria, upon which a Latin liturgy is here represented as pressing with peculiar weight, is more completely free from the grievance (if grievance it be) than any Catholic country in the world. In Austria, with the single exception of Mass, every public service of the Church is said or sung in the vernacular. This is a fact for which we will venture to trust our memory so far as to refer to the Protestant authority of Mr. Turnbull. At all events, we can refer to the "Austrian Encyclopædia" (quoted in the sixth volume of the Université Catholique, p. 69) which praises the Imperial edict of 1781 for having (among other things) so ordered matters that "the liturgical chaunts should be no longer in Latin only, but also in the vernacular tongue."

That the Austrian clergy are ignorant of Latin is not merely a falsehood, but also a physical impossibility—the fact being that in the Austrian Universities theology is taught only in the Latin language, instead of being taught, as in the other German Universities, in the German language. An Austrian cannot go through his ordinary theological studies without being tolerably well versed in Latin. These two gross, notorious, and palpable falsehoods therefore give us the measure of the Reviewer's conscience and honesty.

The second point—the refusal of the cup to the laity—need not detain us long. It is, however, conclusive against the statement that the clerical agitators spoken of are merely reformers of practical corruptions in morals, and intend to leave Faith untouched. There can be no question of moral corruption here; and the prominence given to such a point, after the decisions of the Council of Trent, can only proceed from minds tainted with heresy and unbelief. Now, as heretofore on similar occasions, the pretence is moral reform; the end and aim of the struggle is the subversion of Faith, and the establishment of Rationalism and loose living.

"With the third point," says the Reviewer, "commences our difficulty"—that is, the difficulty of condensing into the six or eight following pages a sufficient number of "beastly"—we use his own word—falsehoods, directed in the usual Exeter-Hall style against the Confessional. The practical results of the Confessional admit of an easy test within the compass of the British dominions, and upon exclusively Protestant and official authority. Ireland and England: in the former country we have millions of poor and outwardly-degraded peasants, with a miserable insufficient supply of teachers, trodden down into the most abject poverty, and utterly destitute of every physical means of ensuring or promoting decency of life, to say nothing of virtuous living. That people has the use of the Confessional. The Reviewer says, "that if it had been the intention of any body of men to corrupt the morals of the human race, to habituate children of both sexes to impurity, filth, and profligacy, it would have been impossible to have devised a scheme more completely adapted to produce that effect than the Confessional as it is now carried on in the Church of Rome."

Well, this Irish people, whom every physical and every social circumstance combines to lure or force into immorality, have, moreover, the irresistible impulse of this most astutely-concocted instrument of filth. What is the result? If what the Reviewer says be true, or be anything like the truth, it is—we may almost say physically impossible that they should be anything else than the most debauched, profligate, unchaste, impure race on the face of the world. Naturally of a warm and amorous temperament; sunk far below any level of human respectability and considerations of mere decorum; apart from the influences of virtue, and tutored by this impure Confessional, they must be monsters of filth. There is no hope for it unless the Reviewer be a lie-monger—which ~~he is not~~. Now, the fact—the notorious fact—is that on the face of the earth there is not a more chaste people than these same Confessional-haunting Irish. This is one side of the experiment.

For the contrast we have only to look at home. Here we have a Protestant race of people, untouched by the Confessional, instructed in their duties "by the purest and most primitive Church that ever existed," which Church has enjoyed almost uninterrupted sway over them for two or three centuries. What is the case here? Why, here the agricultural peasantry are torpid in their intellects; brutal in their tastes, and (as a class) without any sense or knowledge of chastity—and are so proved to be by Protestant official reports. The town population has more intellectual activity, the same amount of moral restraint—and, consequently, a much wider scope for vice, and a much more effective practice of it. These two great facts should in common prudence be maturely considered by any writer, however unscrupulous, before he begins to lecture us upon the filth of the Confessional.

But there is a third fact to which we wish to draw the attention of such of the readers of this Reviewer as may chance to read the TABLET. The Reviewer admits, seemingly for the purpose of making his "beastly" accusations more effective by assuming the cant of candour, that "there is much genuine piety and virtue in Rome." He must admit—or deny all history—that those canonised Saints who have treated of moral theology have been persons of extraordinary purity of mind. As one of the later instances, we give St. Alphonsus, of whom it is said by those who knew him most intimately, that it is doubtful if in his life he ever committed even a venial sin deliberately. Now, our Reviewer admits (p. 162) that the heads of the Church have it at heart to promote "decorum of manners," and to root out moral corruptions.

At page 158 he tells us that "it is impossible, in the very nature of things, that a young female, or almost any female, can have such a burden on her conscience as can make her desire often to resort to special and private confession to a priest." Now, we desire the Reviewer to put all these facts and statements together, and, having done so, to furnish us with his explanation of this other fact, that the purest-minded Saints—such as St. Alphonsus; men the most practised in the Confessional; those best acquainted with the weaknesses of the human heart, its dangers and frailties; always have most earnestly recommended frequent confession; and the more frequent, the more innocent and spotless the penitent may be. Penitents, says St. Alphonsus, of of a very delicate conscience are in the habit of going to confession "every day," quotidie; but to avoid a troublesome and unreasonable scrupulosity, he recommends that ordinarily "once, or, at most, twice a week, is sufficient for spiritual persons."

Does any one suppose that these spiritual persons frequent the Confessional to accuse themselves of mortal sins? or wait to go there till they have something very grievous to repent of? No one who is not shamefully ignorant of the Catholic practice in these matters, or deliberately dishonest, would ever write or publish such trash. The more tender the conscience, the greater the horror of sin, that is, the purer the life, the more eager is the desire for the Confessional—partly because, in the defined and solemn inquiry which precedes confession, the strongest resolutions are formed against sin, and partly because in the reception of this sacrament, a grace is communicated which is the strongest supernatural preservative against sin.

The Reviewer writes like a person to whom the angelical purity of a holy life is unknown; and he gives us the impression of one whose soul has a "beastly" hankering after impurity; who has no faith in virtue; and whose favourite companions have been persons of loose and disorderly lives. That he is either a wilful utterer of fiendish lies, or that he has never tried even to understand the practical system upon which he writes, is perfectly obvious to every instructed Catholic. And it is not less evident that if he has read the books he quotes so flippantly—the Catholic books, we mean, on moral theology—the scientific treatises on, "the Morbid Anatomy of the Human Soul," he has done so rather to feed an impure imagination and stimulate a filthy appetite, than to derive from them the lessons of virtue and warnings against vice with which, to a reflective mind, they abound and superabound.

Having taken this measure of our author's character, let us hear him speak a little further.

We will confine ourselves at present to two dioceses in France, and two in Germany in each of which we have ourselves resided. In each of the former, on a certain fixed day, a very excellent prelate assembles all the clergy of his See in the Cathedral, where, with closed doors, and in secret, they celebrate together the holiest mysteries of their faith. Mass being ended, the bishop proceeds to address a convocatio ad clerum, in which he enumerates all the cases of immorality which have occurred amongst the clergy in the course of the last year, with the sentences which have been passed by the ecclesiastical tribunals. The names of the parties are carefully concealed; some are known to priests resident in the immediate neighbourhood—but the greater part have escaped even local notoriety; many have become known only through the confessional: the participes criminis have perhaps been removed into other parishes and then revealed to new confessors that which would otherwise have remained secret, and which has thus come round to the ears of the prelate in whose diocese the culprit resided. Sometimes the weight of sin can be no longer borne on the conscience, and voluntary confessions have been made. A thrill of horror pervaded the assembly on one occasion when the good bishop had finished his recital; and then, with many tears, at the head, and in the name of the whole body of his clergy, he confessed the sin of the priests and people, and implored forgiveness. Such is the practice in two different dioceses in France.

A little lower down the Reviewer speaks of being "personally acquainted" with these very facts. He dates this scene in France, and says that "scarce a Roman Catholic layman of any rank, or of whatever general intelligence, has the smallest information upon any subject connected with the priests." We put, then, this plain question—How did he, a Protestant Englishman, acquire a "personal acquaintance" with the most secret proceedings of Bishops and clergy in France?—proceedings that could not be revealed without a crime? Either his "personal acquaintance" is an impossible lie—or—he must be an apostate priest—most probably some wretch who has been drummed out of the Church for his infamous life and conversation, or who has left it to gain a freer scope for his detestable enormities.

"Personal acquaintance," mind—we repeat the expression. The best-informed "Roman Catholic laymen" of France know nothing about their priests. The proceedings that take place among the clergy with "closed doors and in secret" are unknown to the best-informed Catholic laymen; but he, an English Protestant, or an apostate priest, has been admitted behind the veil. Suppose him to be what he professes to be—an English Protestant, it is impossible he can have been admitted to the scene he describes. He can have had no "personal acquaintance" with the scene. That must be a lie. His information must be hear say; and his informant must be, by the very fact of the revelation, one of the vilest wretches on the face of the earth. If, on the other hand, he is an apostate priest, his evidence is worth nothing until we know the cause and manner of his apostacy; until we know, for instance, whether it was his wickedness that made "a thrill of horror pervade the assembly;" until we know whether he renounced his religion to give a freer current to the lusts of the flesh; until we have the means of judging whether, like Luther, he has married a nun; whether, like Luther, he sanctions profligacy, condemns chastity as a physical impossibility, upholds fornication and adultery, and has his soul in every way crusted over and hardened with the filth and impurity of the flesh.

We add one more remark under this head. The writer here affects to describe the proceedings of a French diocese. Now, every French priest and bishop lives surrounded by jealous infidel spies, whose eyes are on the watch to detect the smallest slip in conduct or perversity in demean-our—men who would be delighted to publish to the world the fruits of their malignant curiosity—men who have as their unscrupulous backers nine-tenths of the press of France. How is it, then, we ask, that not merely the frailties of their priests are unknown to lay Catholics, but that they do not reach the ears of the infidel portion of the population by whom the priests are surrounded? Every common reader of newspapers knows that recently all the infidel organs of France have been trying to preach down the character of the clergy. And how have they done so? Have they brought out facts of immorality; instances of impurity; cases of shameless indecency? NO. What they have done has been no more than is done in Exeter Hall—that is—to reproduce filthy extracts from books of casuistry; just as they might prove the immorality of physicians by holding up to detestation the filthy plates and descriptions contained in books of anatomy, and by haranguing on the indecent practices of midwifery. But while this English Protestant Reviewer pretends to be “personally acquainted” with cases of clerical immorality wholesale, the French infidel journalists, though at their wits’ end for such cases, have been able to produce none. What a despicable creature this Reviewer must be!

With regard to the fourth point—that of clerical celibacy, the Reviewer causes one sentence which alone would settle a question of his veracity. Speaking of German ecclesiastics in a certain diocese, he says, “It is a remarkable feature in the cases that all the profligate clergy are strong in favour of the continuance of the law of celibacy, whilst all the moral clergy are for abolishing it.” He has forgot to append to this falsehood the fact (for which we refer to an article in the Dublin Review for August, 1841) that this threatened schism has its root only in immoral dioceses, where the discipline of the Church is checked by the despotism of the State; where faith is sapped by infidelity; where the ecclesiastical seminaries have been under “philosophical” control; and where, if the clergy are immoral, their immorality is the natural and necessary result of the anti-Christian principles systematically infused into their souls by the friends of this Reviewer.

As to the danger of even a local schism we very much doubt it; and certainly it is the opinion of the best-informed Catholics that the danger has very considerably decreased since the noble exertions made by the illustrious Confessor of Cologne. For a more detailed account than we can pretend to furnish of the spiritual condition of Catholic Germany, we must refer to the before-mentioned article in the Dublin Review. We are happy to add from other sources our confirmation of the fact stated by the Reviewer, that the anti-celibataire party in Germany has received a great blow from the triumph of Cologne; and that since that auspicious event a new spirit has been aroused, and Papal Catholicism has every where been rising more and more throughout Germany, to the confusion and dismay of the unprincipled confederacy of which this Reviewer is the miserable organ.

LETTER NO. XXII.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—Say, in illustrating our rules of Faith, we take as the first case the condition of children; now bear in mind the spirit of your rule; recollect no stepping across the line of demarcation, for if you do, you decidedly borrow or adopt the Catholic rule, and fear not that I shall encroach upon yours. Proceed! What are you about—What do I see? Why, you are giving Catechisms to your children to learn by heart, and expositions of the Bible to read, and I hear you expounding and interpreting the whole to them! Is this! “That they are first to examine the doctrine, and according to that to judge of the purity of the Church?” Is this! that they are to examine and judge for themselves—to exercise their own judgment in matters of faith? This I will not permit you to do unless you are ready at the first step to renounce your rule of faith, for this is exactly the way which the Catholic Church adopts—this is bona-fide her rule and practice, and entirely in opposition to the spirit of yours. You may perceive then that your Protestant rule, as regards children at least, is wholly absurd, unreasonable, unnatural and altogether impracticable. Now I invite you, on the other hand, to look at the Catholic Church, instructing her children according to her professed and legitimate rule, not like you following a rule you decry; how beautiful is the picture which the imagination can draw of her and her little ones, and how still more lovely is the reality; their earthly mothers hardly give up nursing them, when she, like a tender mother and affectionate parent, takes them by the hand, and becomes their spiritual nurse and their guide, from the moment he receives her children at the font, she loses not sight of them, nor ceases to guard, instruct, and to admonish them, until in ripened old age she performs the last sacred rite over their graves, nay, even after death, she forgets them not, but her prayers, like the aspirations of angels, are continually offered up as a holocaust to the Lord for the rest of the faithful departed. The Catholic Church then is the zealous and devoted instructor of the young even in their very childhood; she expounds to them out of the sacred book the word of life, or gives them the essence of it, as a mother administers food to an infant babe according to its strength, that it may be impressed upon their hearts, instilled into their memories, and implanted into their souls, and as she dismissed them to enter into life, she fervently and solemnly enjoins them never to forget the spiritual lessons and the holy doctrines taught to them in their youth; she may grant them, as her ministers may deem prudent, liberty to peruse the holy scriptures, for edification and instruction, but not to rest it to their own destruction; not to raise contentions, enmities, dissensions, and sects, as "no prophesy of scripture is by private interpretation." Let us now again turn to Protestantism at this stage, after it has virtually and indirectly acknowledged the absurdity and impracticability of its own dogma, by practically teaching by the Catholic rule, viz, "that they are to judge of doctrines by the authority and decision of the church," that is, by the authority of the ministers, teachers, &c. who instruct children in their catechism, and explain to them the Bible. Thus each sect rears up its children in its own peculiar faith; each stands as the speaking Catechism of his own creed, each interprets the Bible his own way, and warns his hearers to retain in purity, "the faith as once delivered to the saints," though this his faith is in direct contradiction to that of his neighbours. We may now, however, ~~conclude~~ ^{suppose} that after Protestant children have thus been trained, and are about to be introduced into the wide and wicked world, that their Clergy assemble and address them now, at least, in language, and ground them in a principle quite in opposition to that of the Catholic Church; we may suppose in some such words and sentiments as the following: "we have now carefully instructed you in what we believe to be the saving truths of the Bible, and here is the blessed book, and which you are commanded, as you value your salvation, to examine and according to that to judge whether we have taught you pure or impure doctrine; if you judge the latter, then you can conscientiously reject the doctrines which we have with so much assiduity endeavoured to impress upon your minds, unlearn what you have learnt, because we do not pretend to be infallible teachers, that is, we have no positive certainty that we may not be in error ourselves, therefore it is the principle of the Protestant religion that every one is to judge for himself in matters of faith and "is at liberty to follow whatever doctrine he may judge most consonant with holy writ," no infallible guide being necessary." Gracious heavens! this address—this counsel to be delivered to wayward, thoughtless, fickle, giddy, headstrong youth! It is the principle, however, of the Reformation, and the professed rule of Protestantism; real honesty and sincere belief in the system would dictate the address, but shame and folly together suppose a glaring an insult to reason and common sense. It is like as if you got a party to participate of a certain mixed food, and after they have amply partaken of it, that you then talked about and warned them against poison or unwholesome food, but at the same time would not undertake to assure them most positively that none such were intermixed with what they had just eaten, that therefore it was absolutely necessary for them, if they hoped to be saved, and their bounden duty to ascertain the fact and the nature of the food, by their individually analyzing the component parts of what was to be found in the vessel; truly, the one would not be more madly preposterous than the other. God of all goodness! have you left the soul of man exposed to such a fearful pass as this? that before he can possibly establish the point by his own individual search and examination, he may have swallowed, absorbed into his mind, deadly poison, dangerous doctrine, and long before he could possibly find out by his own scrutiny, if ever he could, the proper antidote or apply it to his soul, that soul may be before your judgment seat, in the world of spirits! Gracious Lord! have you doomed us to this? Provided us with earthly parents or guardians to feed us and to nurse us in infancy; to guide and direct us in youth, to explain to us what is wholesome and sound food for our bodies, and what is pernicious; how to sow and how to reap the first, and how to cut down and destroy the latter, and yet that you established no fixed and definite food for our souls, and that this we are to seek after we have arrived at the years of reason and discretion, and through so dark and intricate a labyrinth that not one in a thousand can ever possibly find it by his own examination and knowledge? Did you, O Lord! design that we are, if we judge right, to discard the prayers which we used to lisp to you in our infancy, and to denounce the doctrines taught to us in our youth? Did you, Father of all goodness, thus provide so well for our temporal and perishable bodies, and so lamentably left our immortal souls unfed with true faith and as a thing of uncertainty, until we essay to acquire it at the very age when passions and evil propensities begin to assume their sway, and when tares may be sown instead of wheat? No, no, God of all wisdom and of all mercy, you instil into the new born infant wherefrom to seek for the first nourishment of life, from the mother's breast, so you teach the new received Christian wherefrom he is to get the bread of eternal life, from his spiritual mother, the Church of the living God. As Isaiah says, "And whom shall he make to understand the hearing? (the doctrine) them that are weaned from the milk, that are drawn away from the breasts." A freshly harrowed field is the period to sow the seed; and to plant young trees when they are but shoots, before they have taken deep root, so it is with children. Youth is the time to plant good seed and sound doctrine in the mind of man, and not leave it exposed to be uprooted as if by violence, at a stage when it might be expected to take deep and firm hold, and to bring forth good fruit. We are told, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old, he will not depart from it." But you would reverse this wise proverb, and nature's law; you would expressly and directly expose him to the danger of departing, when advanced in years, from the training which he received as a child; such is your principle. What would you think of the wisdom of the gardener who would purposely and openly expose the plants which he had with much care and labour put into the ground to the risk and almost certainty of their being immediately afterwards dug up, and replaced by others of a very different sort!—or of the husbandman, who was doubtful as to the quality or nature of the seed he was putting into the ground, and therefore left it optional to every new comer, however ignorant he might be, to sow instead whatever seed each might think proper, and to turn up his own as pernicious?—and yet such is the tendency of your principle; you practice not then your rule as regards children, because it is unreasonable and unfeasible. and you address them not in the modified form which I ventured to draw out, because youth might then laugh in the face of age; the effect of your rule is melancholy enough as you allow it to work, your young people being allowed to go forth with the cold and tacit understanding that they have liberty of conscience, a liberty undefined and indefinite. This, it is true, begets a lukewarm and a wavering sort of faith, and a callous scepticism in the many, or a fanatical presumption in the few, but were this your principle strictly and formally acted up to, according to its literal meaning and true spirit, and sincerely and implicitly believed, in the same ratio that the Catholic believes and follows his, and were men at the same time as keenly alive to their eternal salvation, as they are to their short lived worldly affairs, one's imagination could not possibly devise a system more fraught with the germs of an universal religious anarchy and disruption than this your rule, tending to throw the whole spiritual fabric into one general chaos. If every aspiring and pedantic youth, every ignorant clown took it into his ardent mind or stupid head to take the Bible into his hands, and to constitute himself the judge whether the particular sect he belonged to was pure or impure, whether the translations were true to the original, and if this book was canonical and if that one was apocryphal, if they had the marks of inspiration, and if this and that were the genuine doctrines of the Bible, &c. &c. Do picture to yourself what might be the consequence then of this your rule; and again contemplate, if every young woman, every poor girl, had first to study Greek, Hebrew, and Latin, in order to be enabled to judge of the correctness of the translations; had to compare every disputed point, and estimate the meaning of every text! Ridiculous and absurd notion you will exclaim; you laugh at the very idea, and well you may, but you laugh at yourselves, at your own rule, it is so highly preposterous. If then you think the last so truly absurd and ludicrous, though indeed not more so than the first, will you tell me if Christ prescribed one rule of faith for men, and a different one for women, if the first are to follow their own private judgment, and if the latter are to be guided in their faith by the opinion of the former? What then no infallible guide necessary for those fiery or ignorant youths, for those young and simple maidens? Would you leave them like strange travellers in the midst of a desert, not knowing where was this or that well is to be found? Would you let them remain in the dark without a light, or would you have them be conducted by a fallible guide who might direct them astray, or lead them into a pit? So the God of mercy did not treat the children of Israel in their sojourn through desert wilds towards the land of promise; he moved before them or overshadowed them by day as a "cloud," and a ray of his light, "like fire," stood over them at night, to illuminate, to guide, and to direct them in all their acts and movements. "By the word of the Lord they pitched their tents, and by his word they moved; and kept the watches of the Lord according to his commandment by the hand of Moses." And are we, the children of the new dispensation, not to be so highly favored by the God of heaven? Are we to be left to our own reason and judgment to grope our way through the vast and dark space of ages? No, no, I hear the sweet voice of Jesus calling out to us to "hear the Church, the pillar and ground of truth." Will you not then, my dear friends, admit that the law of Nature as well as the law of Grace bear testimony against your Protestant rule, as indeed you do yourselves by your acts, as being most preposterous and totally unsuitable to the condition and capabilities of children.

Yours faithfully,

C. A. C.

MARVELLOUS STORY.

On the 19th of September, in the year 1840, accompanied by my two sisters-in-law, Miss Edmonstone and Miss Helen Edmonstone, and my little boy, we arrived at the cathedral, and entered it just as the great clock was striking a quarter past eight of the morning. Through the kindness of Father Sorentino, of the Society of Jesus, and through that of the learned Abbé Bianchi, we were shown into most advantageous places.

~~At that time~~ before the phial which contains the blood of St. Januarius was taken out of the chapel dedicated to him, in order to be placed upon the high altar in the cathedral, all the people joined in repeating the Litany of the blessed Virgin, and in reciting aloud several other prayers. When these were finished the silver bust of the saint was taken from the chapel in solemn and imposing procession, and was put upon the high altar. High mass was then performed, whilst the entire cathedral was densely filled with people. At the termination of high mass, the phial containing the blood was carried by one of the canons into the body of the cathedral, in order that every person present might have an opportunity of inspecting the blood and of kissing the phial, should he feel inclined to do so. There were two phials, a large one containing the blood as it had flowed from the wounds of the martyr at his execution, and a smaller one containing his blood mixed with sand, just as it had been taken from the ground on which it had fallen. These two phials were enclosed in a very strong and beautifully ornamented case of silver and glass. I kissed this case, and had a most satisfactory opportunity of seeing the blood in its solid state. Thousands of people, in all ranks of life, from the prince to the beggar, had the same opportunity with myself of witnessing the blood in its solid state; and the canon who held the case as I was looking most intently at it, turned it over and over many times, to prove to us that the blood was not liquid; and as he did this he only touched the case with the extremities of his fingers.

I ought to have mentioned above, that so soon as high mass had terminated, a number of females were admitted into the sanctuary. This was a kind of hereditary right, claimed and possessed by their families time out of mind, on account of their connexion with that of St. Januarius. These privileged women recited aloud the Litany of the blessed Virgin; and they sent up other fervent prayers to Heaven, accompanied with the most extraordinary gesticulations that can possibly be conceived. Strangers who know little or nothing of the Italian language, and who do not enter into the fervour occasioned by a scene like this, have sometimes taken it into their heads that these females are actually abusing the saint for not allowing his blood to liquify so soon as they could wish. But this is a false surmise on their part. I was close to the females at the time that they were praying most fervently, and I heard neither threat nor abuse; all appeared excessive devotional fervour on their parts.

At one o'clock, P. M., by my watch, no symptoms whatever of a change in the blood had occurred. A vast number of people had already left the cathedral, so that I found the temperature of the place considerably lowered.

Precisely at a quarter before two in the afternoon the blood suddenly and entirely liquified. The canon who held the case passed close by me, and afforded me a most favourable opportunity of accompanying him close up to the high altar, where I kissed the phial, and joined my humble prayers to those of the multitude who were blessing and praising Almighty God for this signal mark of his favour in the stupendous miracle which had just taken place.

I kissed the phial again an hour after this, and again at the expiration of another hour, and so on, making in all five times, an hour always intervening betwixt each devotional salutation. By means of these repeated inspections of the blood, I saw that it remained in its liquid state without any apparent tendency to congelation, although the temperature of the cathedral had abated much by five o'clock in the evening, at which hour I kissed the phial for the last time that day. I had been in the cathedral for more than eight hours without once leaving it; and I had watched with intense interest every thing that had taken place on the occasion. This was on the 19th of September; and on the 23d of the same month I visited the cathedral again, betwixt the hours of nine and ten in the morning, just after high mass had been performed at the altar in the chapel of St. Januarius. I examined the blood most minutely; it formed one solid lump, and was quite immovable, as the canon turned the reliquary up and down in various ways before my face. There was no favour shown. The poorest man in the cathedral had an equal opportunity of approaching the relic, and of inspecting it, with the Queen Dowager herself who was there. The blood liquified a few minutes before ten o'clock, and I examined it repeatedly in its liquid state with the same attention which I had shown to it in the afternoon of the 19th.

Nothing in the whole course of my life has struck me so forcibly as this occurrence. Every thing else in the shape of adventures now appears to me to be trivial and of no amount. I here state in the most unqualified manner, my firm conviction that the liquification of the blood of St. Januarius is miraculous beyond the shadow of a doubt. Were I, to conceal this my conviction from the public eye, I should question the soundness of both my head and heart, and charge my pen with arrant cowardice.—Waterton's Natural History.

"The advocates of creeds mock the authority of the Pope of Rome, while they have themselves a paper pope, who, had not the passion for articles of faith been cooled, would have been infinitely worse.* The Lutherans of our day would set up a paper pope in place of one of flesh and blood; instead of the Bible rationally interpreted, their own books of confessions, as a sacred authority—as the eternal law, not only of teaching, but of faith!"†—Pp. 84, 85.

"No. On this point Hengstenberg is a Catholic, and not a Protestant. Nay, the Catholic Church, which possesses a living authority, leaves the Hengstenbergians, &c., far behind; for they cling to a dead authority—to their creeds and symbols which remain as a dead letter; anathematizing without mercy any one who but touches a single hair.‡ It is these papists of Protestantism who injure the good cause. If the principle be once admitted that any created being has a right to cry out to the human mind: 'thus far shalt thou go and no farther,' then he who first exercises the right has gained the point. On the other hand, to exercise this right, and protest against it on the other, is to unite the most consummate injustice with the most inconsistent absurdity!"§—p. 123.

Thus, therefore, in the consistent exercise of the Protestant belief, there is a positive obligation by which each individual is bound, alone and unaided, to form his own opinions from the Bible alone; discarding the human forms of creeds and symbols. Could any consequence be deduced more clearly? And yet could any be more absurd? Has this principle of unassisted inquiry ever been brought into consistent operation? Is it possible that it ever should? As well, with Episcopius,|| require that all, even the unlettered, should master the difficulties of the Hebrew and Greek originals, and discard the human aid of version and paraphrase!

"The duty of searching the Scriptures, it is true, is the ground-work of the Reformation, but for the great mass it is impossible and absurd;¶ without authority, for the majority of mankind a religion is inconceivable. Men are so constituted that, in the affairs of religion, they require a guide.†† We must have creeds, until men shall be able to stand upon their own feet, as, in this world, they never shall.‡‡ Every human exposition of faith is an evil; but a necessary evil, to guard against greater. It is dangerous to truth and liberty; but yet indispensable. Either we must renounce unity and purity of faith altogether, or adopt somewhat of Popery."§§—Pp. 122, 123.

Here, then, on the one hand, the genuine principles of Protestantism preclude the use of creeds and formularies of faith, even for the unlettered multitude; while, on the other, the weakness of the human intellect, the acknowledged and proved obscurity* of the Bible, and the utter incompetency of the vast uneducated majority of mankind, render it impossible that they should be their own masters, even as to the first principles of religion. Where is the sincere inquirer to look for the solution of the difficulty?

"In this undeniable and well-known state of the case, as far as I can comprehend, there remains, as regards what is ambiguous, mysterious, or, in a word, what is not within the comprehension of the ordinary reader of the Bible but this alternative—

"Either to recognize an infallible judge in matters of faith: .

"Or to grant to all who agree with ourselves in professing themselves, Christians, and denying the existence of an infallible authority, the right to judge, as shall seem right to themselves, of all that is dark and incomprehensible; however their judgment may differ from our own, and, this difference notwithstanding, to acknowledge them as brethren in the church.

"But, if we are disposed to adopt the first then I can see no further alternative. There remains for us nothing but straightway to effect a reconciliation with the Catholic Church."†—Pp. 128—30.

It is not a little remarkable, that the wanderings and wild excesses of ultra-Protestantism, should have produced upon the reflecting portion of the community the same impressions, both at home and upon the continent,—a settled conviction of the absolute unfitness of the leading principles of the reform, either to form or regulate the creed, whether of an individual, or, still less, of a community. The high-churchmen of Oxford and the confessionists of Germany are alike agreed, that authority is indispensable as a constituent principle in a consistent creed. Whether the Church of England possess such authority, we must, for the present, leave to be discussed by the parties themselves. We shall content ourselves with transcribing, from a host of similar authorities, one or two very short passages, which it is impossible to mistake.

"In truth, the Catholic supernaturalism is the only consistent scheme.‡ If a religion contain mysteries—if its path towards faith lie over prodigies, the system of infallibility is the only possible one. It is the only system recorded in history, which in the mutual dependence and harmony of its parts, can be said to deserve the name!"§—Pp. 133, 134.

It is no part of our present plan to enter into any examination of the special doctrines by which the Catholic Church is distinguished; we shall pass over, therefore the fifth and sixth chapters, in which an immense host of names and authorities, from every sect and every party, is produced in favor of the doctrines of tradition, the real presence, transubstantiation, purgatory, the invocation of saints, &c. We could not hope to do justice by any selection; and, therefore, shall merely refer the reader to these chapters, as admirable in themselves, and as furnishing a most valuable supplement to those collections of Protestant authorities with which we are already familiar.

We come now to the history of the rise and progress of the Reformation, with the doctrinal divisions and variations of the several sects into which it was split even in its cradle. We feel that it would be impossible to offer even an analysis of these most interesting chapters (vii. viii.); every authority illustrates some particular point,—every page is full of its own peculiar meaning; the whole is a succinct history of this extraordinary religious revolution in all its phases; and although it be composed of extracts from a great number of authors, exclusively Protestant, yet, so admirable is the skill with which they are selected and arranged, that it presents all the appearance of a uniform and continuous narrative.

Nor could any history present such claims upon the almost implicit confidence of the reader. It does not put forward the one-sided views of an enemy of the reform, and a partisan of the Papacy. It is drawn up by the hands of the very men who were engaged in the work; or, at least, whose interest it was to conceal its defects. Not a single Catholic writer is cited in the entire range of the narrative; it is a purely Protestant history of the Protestant Reformation. We see its entire machinery laid bare,—and by those who were well acquainted with its workings; the motives by which its apostles were influenced; the means which they employed in its propagation. Let the reader, when he has learned, upon this unquestionable evidence, the human motives and human passions in which it had its rise; the rapine and licentiousness which disgraced its progress; the anarchy, civil and religious, which it produced wherever its steps were turned; when he has read of the ignorance and uncertainty which marked its earliest steps; the pride and personal feeling, as in the question of the blessed eucharist; or the mere accident, as in the controversy with Eck, in which its most important doctrinal changes originated; when he has turned, in loathing, from the foul and un-Christian language in which the holiest questions are discussed, and the most exalted personages assailed; the coarse and calumnious devices by which the popular passions were excited;—with all this before his eyes, and upon the authority of the abettors and apologists of the Reformation, let him ask himself, whether this was the work of God—whether it be possible that it was prompted by his Holy Spirit in its origin, or guided by his eternal wisdom in its after progress?

“The fiery youths, the princes, are the best Lutherans of all; they take presents and money from the cloisters and foundations; the multitude also appropriate the jewels, no doubt with the good intention of taking care of them.* The great mass of the people seem to have embraced the new gospel, solely for the purpose of shaking off the yoke of discipline, fasting, penances, &c., which Popery laid upon them, in order that they might live according to their own inclination, and give free rein to their inordinate passions.*

“To the princes Luther gave monasteries, cloisters, and abbeys; to the priests, wives; to the multitude, freedom; and that was doing a great deal for his cause.† The great were, for the most part, influenced by the church property; the ecclesiastics, by the liberty to marry; the common people, by the hope of being freed from confession and other burdens. In fine, most of them had their private views and interests, although the profession and the love of truth was made to serve as the cloak for all.”‡—Pp. 322—4.*

Dr. H. has collected a good many specimens of the spirit and temper in which their theological discussions were conducted. But we feel that we should not consult either the instruction or the taste of our readers by transcribing them here. And, indeed, it would be an endless task; for the same spirit distinguished all their controversies. The dispute with Carlstadt, with Zuinglius, that with Erasmus—though in a less remarkable degree—with Storch and the Baptists, all teem with the same unworthy spirit; nor do we conceive it possible, that any man rising from the examination of the controversies of that day, in which the holiest opinions of antiquity were overturned, and the wildest novelties substituted in their place,—knowing the spirit in which they were examined,—the ignorance of many; the pride and obstinacy of almost all the combatants, and the unrelenting hate with which each persecuted in the rest that freedom of conscience which all claimed for themselves, we do not think it possible that any man can look, without shuddering, upon this almost irremediable revolution; nor, however strong his prejudices in favor of the reformed religion, shut out from his mind the startling suggestion, that, in this great revolution, there was but little of that calm deliberation which distinguishes prudent councils; that opinions and practices, which age had consecrated and authority rendered venerable, were rejected from pique, or condemned without examination; that the majestic work of wise and saintly centuries was torn down in a few troubled years of anarchy and outrage, and the authority of the holiest and wisest men who had enlightened Christianity, rudely pushed aside by an excited multitude, dogmatizing from impulse or passion, rather than conviction; and, in the fury of the hour, shut out from the possibility of calm or rational discussion.

The eighth chapter details the after history of the principal sects into which the leading families of the reform were subdivided; the story of each sometimes told by their own historians, but always from the pen of some one who, like themselves, was an enemy of Catholicity. It is in this portion of the history that the full working of their principles is developed. Hitherto they have appeared in a position, in which they are, more or less, influenced by a common object; hitherto, to adopt the language of Henke, we have seen them in the first phase of revolution. The work of demolition went on with comparative harmony; but now the labor, far more perplexing, of reconstruction commenced; and it is here that all Lutherans, Calvinists, Anglicans, have conspired to furnish the best moral evidence of those Catholic principles which it was their common object to upturn. Scarce had Luther been called to his last and fearful account when the thin veil of external union, which his despotic rule had flung over the dissensions of his party, was torn into a thousand fragments. The Antinomian controversy furnished the first material of strife; and, in a short time, divided the territory of Lutheranism into two districts—their head-quarters at Meissen and Thuringen—as distinct and as inveterate in their hostility, as if they had never been united under one ruler. The spirit soon extended over the entire country; and we may judge of the rage of the contending parties, from the report industriously circulated by the partisans of one opinion, that the devil had carried off Osiander, one of the leaders of the opposite party, and torn his body into pieces. So firmly was it believed, that the corpse was publicly exhumed, in order to remove the impression! Nor was it confined to their public relations: it extended even to the intercourse of private life; and Menzel tells* that a party of sacramentarian refugees, consisting of women and children, who sailed from London in the depth of winter, were prohibited to land, under pain of death, successively at the ports of Wismar, Rostock, Lubeck, and Hamburg, simply because their leader had distinguished himself by his writings in the sacramentarian controversy!

The discussions on works, free-will and a thousand other points, furnished never-failing fuel for this intolerant spirit. In vain did the authorities resort to the Catholic expedient of synods and concordias. Their formularies were disregarded by the dogmatizers whom they sought to silence; and only supplied new material for dissensions to that party whose opinions they attempted to embody.

We could not hope to follow them through their after-wanderings; nor do we suppose that, except as illustrating the utter incapacity of any body of men to be their own guides in religion, there can be much interest in the motley history of the Gichtelians and Weigelians, the Ubiquitarians and Syncretists; or even the numerous, and, for a time, triumphant sect of Pietists, though it bears a striking resemblance to an important party of our own time. As each branch fell away from the mouldering stem, it divided into new fragments, each enjoying a short-lived existence, sufficiently protracted to perpetuate the seeds of disunion and strife.

The dissensions of the Calvinistic party form the second section of this important chapter. The author confines himself particularly to those formal divisions which took place in the Low Countries during the early part of the succeeding century. The rule of Calvin was not a whit less arbitrary than that of Luther; nor was it more successful in suppressing the spirit of insubordination, although the banishment of Servetus Castalia, and the burning of Servetus, held out a fearful warning to those who might venture to think for themselves. To such a pitch did the disputes on predestination rise, that the authorities at Berne prohibited the discussion altogether. But it was in the Low Countries that the great organic changes in the constitution of Calvinism were brought about. The attempt to force the Belgic Confession and the Catechism of Heidelberg upon the people, called up the storm which had been gathering for half a century. The remonstrants, as the protesting party was called, from their remonstrance against the fifth article, found an able leader in Arminius; while the contra-Remonstrants were headed by Francis Gomar; a name since famous, and identified with the darkest shade of Calvin's gloomy creed.

This party underwent many modifications. On the question, whether or not God's eternal decree of reprobation, precede, in the order of reason, the fore-knowledge of our common fall in Adam, they divided themselves into supra-lapsarians and sub-lapsarians; and after a vain attempt, in 1614, to effect reconciliation, or at least mutual toleration, they subdivided into tolerants and non-tolerants. The unhappy John Barneveldt fell a victim in his grey hairs to the malignant bigotry of this party; and his companion in imprisonment, Hugo Grotius, owed his escape from a similar fate to the affectionate and intrepid stratagem of his wife. But notwithstanding these violent measures, and the explicit condemnation of the Arminian doctrines in the synod of Dort—notwithstanding the deprivation and banishment of beyond eighty ministers who refused to submit*—the opinions still maintained their hold; and the dissensions of the party continued unabated. The question of the observance of the Sabbath, soon after, excited a new flame, which blazed with equal fury. In all these contests the liberty of Protestantism was utterly forgotten; nor was there one who did not feel the justice of the declaration by which the celebrated Isaac Papin justified his return to Catholic unity: "That if an individual Protestant did wrong in refusing to submit to the decisions of his synod, the whole Protestant party was wrong in rebelling against the synod of Trent."

The variations of Protestantism in England—the total remodelling of the articles and liturgy in 1562—the infusion of Calvinism at and after this period—the division into high and low church—the latitudinarian tendency, to which the names of Tillotson, Burnet, Hoadley, Chillingworth, and Watson, in their respective days, lent their sanction—the origin and increase of Methodism, with its own internal subdivisions—and finally, the motley forms under which dissent has, at all times, maintained its struggle with the Establishment—these form the third section; and the divisions of the Baptists under Joris, Hoffman, Nicholai, and Menno, the fourth; and lastly as if to show the impossibility of union, no matter how few the articles of belief, a section is given to the dissensions even of the Unitarians; although it might be supposed that they, at least, had narrowed the debatable principles so far, as to render disagreement impossible or indifferent as to the few which remained. Thus, through an immense mass of extorted evidence, which it would be idle to attempt to condense, it is shown—from the first principles of the Protestant creed—from the history of its origin and progress—from the practical working of all the varied forms under which it has been tried by the several sects which have arisen since that period—that nothing approaching, even remotely, to the appearance of unity, ever has been, or ever can be, permanently maintained under its influence.

But it is time to draw to a close; and most willingly, had we not already exceeded our proposed limits, would we translate entire into our pages the concluding chapter, in which are recorded numberless admissions, which candor has wrung even from the enemies of our church, that in her bosom alone is found the true home of the Christian inquirer after truth.

"When we look back upon past ages," says Hurter,* the Protestant historian of Innocent III., "and behold how the Papacy has outlived all other institutions, how it has witnessed the rise and wane of so many states;—itself, amid the endless fluctuations of human things, preserving and asserting the self-same unchangeable spirit,—can we wonder that many look to it as that Rock which rears itself unshaken amid the beating surges of time?"

"The Catholic faith, if we concede its first axiom, which neither the Lutherans nor the range of the narrative, even the Enchiridion of a pure Protestants, have been so long habituated to insult yet we have been so long habituated to insult and revile, that we are content to bear on a little longer, in consideration of the better spirit of inquiry which is, even thus, excited. The progress of truth, however it may be modified by circumstances, or retarded by national or educational prejudice, still, in its general results, is uniform and secure; nor does it require much acquaintance with the polemical history of our own times, to read, in the attempted revival of high-church authority in England, the same principles which guided back to the Catholic Church the steps of Stolberg and Schlegel in Germany; the same dissatisfied consciousness of the insufficiency of early convictions—the same unacknowledged want which individual resources cannot supply—the same unavowed, and probably unfelt, tendency to that unerring authority, which reason and experience alike have taught is the only stay for the weakness, the only guide for the waverings, of the human understanding. One † who was well qualified to read the signs of the age, has forewarned his fellow Protestants that their church will lose more of her members. The statistical returns of each succeeding year prove that he has read them aright; and that the time has come for the fulfilment of that prediction, which a few years experience of the anarchy his own labor had brought forth, extorted from the founder of the Reformation himself. ‡

"We, Protestant as we are, when we take in at one view this wondrous edifice, from its base to its summit, must acknowledge that we have never beheld a system, which, the foundation once laid, is raised upon such certain and secure principles; whose structure displays, in its minutest details, so much art, penetration and consistency; and whose plan is so proof against the severest criticism of the most profound science!"†—Pages 705, 706.

We have now traced the wanderer through his long and wearisome course,—full, alas! "of much labor and affliction of spirit,"—from the first doubt which crosses his troubled mind, to the full solution of all in the acknowledgment of that divine faith, which, like its heavenly Master, is "yesterday, to-day, and for ever." The zealous author has subjoined, in an appendix, an account of the most distinguished among those who, like himself, have trodden this laborious path, and, like him too, found a rest from labors in the ancient home of Catholicity.

"It is on record," says Mr. Rose,* in his most interesting, though appalling work on the state of Protestantism in Germany, "that some sought in the bosom of a church, which, amid all its dreadful corruptions, at least possessed the form and retained the leading doctrines of a true church, the peace which they sought in vain amid the endless variations of the Protestant churches of Germany, and their gradual renunciation of every doctrine of Christianity." Nor is the spirit confined to Germany. It is the main-spring, strenuously and sincerely though it be disclaimed, of that remarkable revulsion of feeling and principle which the late publications of the Oxford press display. There is still a clinging, to be sure, to the vague and unsubstantial phantom of high-church authority. But the principle is in truth the same which has guided so many back to the fold of Catholic unity; and a brief trial will decide the justice of its application.

We regard this remarkable religious movement with the deepest interest, and we look forward to the issue with the most assured hope. We cannot but admire the manliness and learning with which its leaders put forward their view in the controversy with their brethren of the establishment; and, although we deplore the acrimony, not to say blindness, with which the holiest tenets of our religion are discussed, yet we have been so long habituated to insult and revile, that we are content to bear on a little longer, in consideration of the better spirit of inquiry which is, even thus, excited. The progress of truth, however it may be modified by circumstances, or retarded by national or educational prejudice, still, in its general results, is uniform and secure; nor does it require much acquaintance with the polemical history of our own times, to read, in the attempted revival of high-church authority in England, the same principles which guided back to the Catholic Church the steps of Stolberg and Schlegel in Germany; the same dissatisfied consciousness of the insufficiency of early convictions—the same unacknowledged want which individual resources cannot supply—the same unavowed, and probably unfelt, tendency to that unerring authority, which reason and experience alike have taught is the only stay for the weakness, the only guide for the waverings, of the human understanding. One † who was well qualified to read the signs of the age, has forewarned his fellow Protestants that their church will lose more of her members. The statistical returns of each succeeding year prove that he has read them aright; and that the time has come for the fulfilment of that prediction, which a few years experience of the anarchy his own labor had brought forth, extorted from the founder of the Reformation himself. ‡

NEALE'S TOUR TO THE ANCIENT CHURCHES OF ENGLAND.

We call the attention of our readers to an article (a portion of which we are enabled to publish this week) taken from the Dublin Review of June last. It is a review of a little work entitled Hierologus; or, the Church Tourists, by the Rev. J. M. Neale, a member of the Anglican Church.

It is a matter of no small gratification to Catholics in general, and to those of India in particular—where fanaticism and bigotry are rampant,—to find that, whilst their religion is decried, their institutions calumniated, and they themselves abused, by the ignorant and the self-interested,—there are men, sincere and honest, who, having made religion their primary study, are now seen to cast off the prejudices with which ignorance had darkened their understanding, and to stand forth the champions of the very rites and ceremonies of the Catholic Church which they were wont heretofore to condemn;—and these are gentlemen by birth and education,—men of integrity and sound principle. We state this by way of a contrast to some few in this country who calumniate from a bad spirit and condemn from ignorance;—who, from want of a knowledge of the truth, and from a depraved principle, egotistically attribute all excellencies to their own faiths,—however incongruous and inconsistent they may in themselves be,—and slander that of the Catholics, which to them is ever an object of “ignorant scorn and bigoted misrepresentation.”

The Rev. Mr. Neale, the author of the work above alluded to, seems a zealous and sincere member of the Anglican Church,—and yet with what ardency does he pray and long for that day when his Church will adopt the external forms and the beautiful and expressive ceremonies of the Catholic Church, which “in his mind have a profound meaning and in his heart have awakened a loving, longing desire to know and realize the great truths which are symbolised therein.” To what can we attribute these changes in the opinion of the Clergy of the Church of England, and to what do they tend? If “the march of intellect,” which is so rapidly progressing towards the enlightenment of mankind, can be the means of making the so called “mummeries of the Catholic Church” to appear in the estimation of those, the most and indeed among the enlightened, as naying gratitude, they compel us, and appreciation in body yet present in spirit, with every justice, most affectionate Father, the persons who have you expressed a desire to be want of proper ending the state of the Missions them, are obstinate of our own private affairs, gate the truth,—evidence, our passage to Macao niate and aspersions pleasant; we had a storm in the rant of,—may want, by the grace of God, we and perverse—med-for shore of China in health any correct principle daring to delay at Macao in portunity they may rigorous law forbidding all whatever is beyond ~~their~~ limited and grovelling comprehension? We are ready to make allowance for prejudice—that prejudice in particular which is implanted in the breast of many a Protestant from his very infancy, against our faith;—but when no means are taken at a maturer age to ascertain whether that prejudice is well founded, in regard to the truth or otherwise of each allegation that tended to its adoption, but, on the contrary, is blindly adhered to,—we say, and we say it advisedly, that it were better if such men professed not Christianity. Arrogance, self-sufficiency and prejudice are ever to be deprecated, but when to these, falsehood is added, and they are brought together to bear upon an endeavour to condemn the rites and ceremonies of a Christian Church, of which the parties can know nothing,—the act becomes a crime: a crime of the deepest dye. We invite every Christian of whatever denomination he be, to a serious consideration of the subject.

THE APOSTOLIC SEE AND THE BENGAL VICARIATE.

The following gratifying communication to every good Catholic in Bengal, has been lately received by His Grace the Archbishop, from His Eminence the Cardinal Prefect of the Propaganda:—

MOST ILLUSTRIOUS AND

MOST REVEREND LORD,

As two approved Priests of the Holy Order of St. Benedict and of the Cistercian Community, and a third Priest also, of the Augustinian Order, have presented themselves to the Sacred Congregation, with the view of consecrating their Ministry to the service of God in India, we, previously to our referring to any other Prelate there, wish to ascertain from your Lordship, first, whether it would be pleasing to you to receive them among your Missionaries, and next, whether, at least in part, you could contribute to defray their travelling expenses to India.

We may here add, that these Missionaries are now diligently studying the English language.

For the harmony of the purest of us with as denied, is as consistent and as consistent as the books of Euclid. The entire Roman, your Lordship founded on the fact of a supernatural, designed for the whole human, it embraces all generations, for your Lordship's present, can never be interrupted Servant, the sublime work, accomplished Cardinal, Pref. and sealed by his blood, would be contrary to the hypothesis, eventually to perish by the weak A. B. of men. These consequences of principles are indisputable; and they, with full confidence of Catholic belief which, who has, within by that time, accomplished such great things for the Bengal Mission, has, on his part, conveyed for himself and his faithful flock, the expression of their united gratitude to the Holy See for the distinguished predilection thus evinced in their regard, and has undertaken in return, to refund to the Sacred Congregation the sum, which that venerable tribunal may advance, to enable the three excellent Priests above-mentioned to join the Bengal Mission.

THE LIBERATOR.

The news of Mr. O'Connell's liberation was hailed by the liberal of all classes here as the triumph of justice, and of constitutional liberty over injustice and tyranny. By our Catholic brethren it was generally welcomed with a species of religious joy, such as is indulged in by the faithful, when some great event in favor of Catholicity is accomplished by the special interference of its Divine Founder. On Tuesday morning, the holy sacrifice of the Altar was offered up, at the Cathedral, in thanksgiving for this memorable occurrence by the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic. Those of the faithful who had an opportunity of being apprized of the solemnity, assisted at the oblation of the sacred mysteries, with hearts full of joy and gratitude to the Almighty.

WIDOWS' ASYLUM, INTALLY.

It gives us great pleasure to state, for the information, both of the community at large, and of the subscribers to the Widows' Asylum in particular, that twelve aged poor widows are now residing in the Asylum lately established at Intally, by the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic. The house in which they reside has been repaired and fitted up at considerable expense for their reception, and a monthly allowance of four rupees is assigned to each widow for her support. As soon as the benefactions to the Institution will permit it, it is intended to increase this allowance, and to provide accommodation for a larger number of widows. The superintendence of the Asylum is confided to the Nuns in charge of the adjoining Female Orphanage. It is the duty of one of these pious Ladies to see that the religious obligation of Morning and Night Prayer be attended to by the widows, and also that these should assist daily at the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, and receive the Holy Sacraments on the appointed Festivals. By degrees, it is hoped, that some industrious occupations suited to their age and infirmities may be introduced among them. As it would be very desirable, to enable the religious Ladies in care of them, to provide medicine, clothing and suitable food, for at least the more infirm of these poor destitute females, it is hoped, that the Subscribers to the Asylum will kindly pay in their contributions to Messrs. Lackersteen and Brothers.

It will encourage all classes of the Christian community to contribute to the Widows' Asylum, when we remind them, that the excellent house where the widows reside, has been generously given for a time, free from all rent, by the respectable Mahommedan family Fuzzel Kurreeem.

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

During the late Holidays, Rustomjee Cowasjee, Esq. and his excellent family honoured the Chandernagore Orphanage with a visit. The Lady Superiress conducted them through the dormitories, the refectory and the School rooms. The respected Visitors were so much pleased with the order and regularity of the Institution, as well as with the appearance of the Children, that the Lady of Rustomjee Cowasjee, Esq. on leaving the Orphanage, handed to the Superioress the liberal donation of one hundred Rupees, whilst Rustomjee Cowasjee, Esq. requested Chevalier C. R. Lackersteen, who accompanied the Visitors, to send the Subscription Book to his Office, at the expiration of the Holidays, in order that he also might have the pleasure of contributing to so useful an Institution.

J. G. WALLER, ESQ.

The Lady of this respected Gentleman having been lately blessed with her first child, in thanksgiving to God for her safe delivery and to obtain the Divine blessing on the first fruits of her marriage, has intimated to the Archbishop, through Mr. Waller, her wish, that two destitute orphans should be provided for, at her expense, in the Bengal Catholic Orphanage.

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, CIRCULAR ROAD.

The Countess Dowager Lackersteen has presented the Archbishop with a beautiful Painting in oil, in a superbly gilt frame, representing the Saviour and his Sacred Heart, with the view of having it used as an Altar Piece in one of the Catholic Churches of Calcutta. The Archbishop has placed it over the Altar in the Church of St. John on the Circular Road. The numerous families of Calcutta whose relations are interred in the adjoining cemetery of St. John's, will learn with pleasure, that the Archbishop has arranged that on each Friday,* the Holy Sacrifice of the Altar shall be offered up in this Church at 7 o'clock A. M. for the repose of the souls of the relations and friends of the Benefactors of that Church, and Schools annexed to it. Such as wish to profit of this arrangement are requested to send in their names to the very Rev. Dr. Kennedy, Principal of St. John's College, Intally. The alms which may be thus collected, will be employed in such proportion as the Archbishop may direct, for the expenses of the Church, for the support of the officiating Clergymen, and for the maintenance of the Male and Female Schools attached to St. John's Church.

ST. FRANCIS XAVIER'S CONVENT CHAPEL, BOW BAZAR.

A handsomely carved ivory Crucifix has been presented by the Countess Dowager Lackersteen for the Altar of the very beautiful Chapel lately established at Bow Bazar. The splendid Altarpiece erected there, and which under the type of the Woman in the Apocalypse crowned with stars, and standing on the moon, represents the ever blessed Virgin Mother of the Saviour, has been lately brought from Paris, at the instance of the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic. We congratulate our numerous brethren in Bow Bazar, as well on the opening of their really tasteful and commodious Chapel, as on the admirably arranged Schools annexed to it for all classes of the Community, and we exhort them to unite together cordially and generously according to their means, to support and improve the religious and educational advantages, with which God has now blessed them.

(TRANSLATED FROM THE LATIN.)

To the Right Rev. Dr. Carew, Vicar Apostolic, Calcutta.

MY LORD,—Whilst the favours your Lordship conferred upon us remain deeply impressed upon our minds, and indeed ~~we are~~ so merit our undying gratitude, they compel us, though absent in body yet present in spirit, to remember you, most affectionate Father, the more so, because you expressed a desire to be informed respecting the state of the Missions in China, as well as of our own private affairs. Favoured by Providence, our passage to Macao was sufficiently pleasant; we had a storm in the Chinese Sea, but, by the grace of God, we reached the wished-for shore of China in health and safety. Not daring to delay at Macao in consequence of a rigorous law forbidding all Roman Missionaries to set foot therein, we took our departure for Hong-Kong, where the Roman Procurator at present resides. But alas! upon our arrival there, we found that the good Father Theodore Joset had died, a cause of sincere sorrow to us all. His death is attributed to the excessive grief he felt at his expulsion from Macao, as well as to the toils and numberless inconveniences he had to endure, particularly whilst building a Church and dwelling-house, which he conducted alone, as also to the intolerable heat he had to suffer whilst building the Church, himself all the time living in a hut. His place is to be supplied for a time by Father Feliciani, O. S. F. who talks of resigning it soon, and therefore will be succeeded by Father Buffa as Procurator.

Having found a favourable opportunity, after a month we left Hong-Kong, leaving there Fathers Buffa and Jeremia for some time. We did not travel by the usual route through Canton, which at present is attended with danger, but went by the way of Nankin, and indeed, so successful was our arrival, that we ought to render incessant acts of thanksgiving to Almighty God, who never abandons such as repose their confidence in Him.

In this province we met with the good Jesuit Fathers, and sojourned with them four days. It is impossible to describe how kindly and hospitably they entertained us, and supplied us with all necessaries in abundance. It may be truly said, they excel in hospitality. These worthy Jesuits have a commodious and handsome house, with a College attached to it, not as yet very numerously attended. Having taken leave of the Jesuit Fathers, we proceeded on our journey and arrived in safety at Huquan, our destined province.

About a month after our arrival, namely, at Easter, we assembled together, six Priests and the Vicar Apostolic, to celebrate that great Festival—and such was the peace and tranquility which prevailed, that it would seem the time had arrived, at which our solemn worship was publicly permitted. May the most bountiful God deign to have pity upon this deserted vineyard, and not enkindle all his wrath against it, but vouchsafe to support us, who with the intensest impatience await that happy moment. I feel convinced that your Lordship's zeal for the glory of God will receive sweet consolation, if I but give you some information respecting the Missions of China; therefore I shall not remain silent. We have in China, eight Vicariates, viz. the Vicariate of Pekin, Shansin, Siensin, Sutchuen, Huquan, Kiansin, Nankin, and Fukien. The Vicar Apostolic of Pekin is a Portuguese, those of Shansin and Siensin, Italians, that of Sutchuen, a Frenchman, of Huquan, an Italian, of Kiansin, a Frenchman, that of Nankin, an Italian, and that of Fukien, a Spaniard. The Bishop of Shansin has a Coadjutor, an Italian Bishop, that of Siensin has a French one, that of Sutchuen, a Spaniard. We have also beyond the great wall in Tartary two French Vicars Apostolic. Our European Priests exceed fifty. Our Chinese are about a hundred. The number of Christians, according to the statement of our Vicar Apostolic, who has been thirteen years on this Mission, and is very well acquainted with the affairs of China, amounts to about five hundred thousand, but it is past all doubt that it far exceeds four hundred thousand. As a still further proof of our everlasting gratitude and esteem, perhaps you may accept a few trifles, which, though we scarcely venture to offer, yet, we most humbly entreat your Lordship, by your innate goodness of heart and that truly fraternal love wherewith you have ever regarded us, to accept as manifest proofs of our devoted attachment.

With humblest entreaties we request your pious Nuns, that, following the example of the B. V. Mary,—they would offer Missionary prayers for us,—that the Lord may vouchsafe to bless this vineyard for his own greater honour and glory, whilst we, however coldly and imperfectly, shall perform our part with God, for them. May it please your Lordship to convey our most affectionate respects to Mr. Lackerteen and every member of his excellent family, and at the same time inform them of our everlasting gratitude and esteem for them. Unwilling to trespass any further upon you, on our bended knees begging your paternal benediction,

We remain, your Lordship's
Most humble Servants,

FRANCIS TIEN.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE MISSION.

We have been kindly favoured with a number of the Cape Frontier Times of the 25th July last, containing a detailed account of the dedication of a beautiful Catholic Church in the colony. This intelligence cannot fail to be highly gratifying to our readers, and particularly to those of our fellow Catholics in Bengal, who have contributed in some measure in the erection of the temple to the living God. It must indeed be a matter of much gratification to the Catholics of Cape Town that they have so venerable and eminent a Prelate as Dr. Griffiths for their head pastor and guide, and now that so noble a Church has been erected under his auspices and through his instrumentality, their gratitude will we are convinced, be commensurate with the merits of so good and zealous a Prelate.

DEDICATION OF THE NEW ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, GRAHAM'S TOWN.

This Church was dedicated to Divine Worship on Sunday last, the 21st July, by the Right Rev. Vicar Apostolic, Dr. Griffith. The edifice, which is capable of containing at least a thousand persons, was crowded in every part long before the commencement of the ceremony,—the assembly including members of all the Christian communities in Graham's Town. Amongst the spectators were his Honor the Lt. Governor, Col. Hare, C. B.; M. West, Esq., Civil Commissioner and Resident Magistrate of the District, together with a number of civil and military officers.

The Bishop in full pontificals, preceded by the Acolytes and the Rev. Messrs. Murphy and Hartigan, commenced the ceremony at the door of the Church with a brief address, in which he explained the sacred nature of a dedication. He then began to pray and to sprinkle the outside walls of the building round which the procession moved, preceded by the band of the 27th Regiment playing the Adeste Fideles, or Portuguese Hymn, whilst the priests were repeating the 50th Psalm. On returning to the door the procession moved up the centre of the church—the bishop and priests repeating the litanies, which were continued at the foot of the altar till towards the end, when the bishop rose and with a threefold invocation prayed that God would cleanse, and bless, and sanctify the place. As soon as the litanies were concluded, the ceremony of sprinkling the inside walls of the edifice was performed—the priests chanting, in procession, the 119th, 120th, and 131st Psalms. Mass was then celebrated, during which the band played selections from Handel's Messiah, after which the bishop, standing at the altar, preached a sermon—of which our limits will not permit us to say more than that it was in every way appropriate to the occasion,—in language simple, though eloquent—in delivery graceful, though unaffected—and in sentiment and spirit truly Catholic—breathing peace and good will towards all communities of Christians. At the conclusion of the sermon he warmly expressed his gratitude for the generous assistance received towards the erection of the building from the officers and privates of the gallant 27th Regiment, and from the members of all other denominations who had so kindly and liberally come forward to assist in the work,—and he also touchingly alluded to the memory of the late Mr. John M'Kenny of this town, who had been a large contributor to the church funds.

The collection amounted to more than £50.

We cannot close our notice of the opening of St. Patrick's Church, without adding a few words descriptive of the edifice: The interior dimensions are 70 feet long, 36 feet wide, and 27 feet high. The architecture is Gothic or Ecclesiastical; the style which prevails in the arches is that termed "The Tudor,"—and that in the tracery and interior ornaments is termed the "Decorated English"; these were the styles which prevailed in the 14th and 15th centuries. The absence of the groined ceiling, or carved ribbed roof, is compensated by an elaborately enriched ceiling and cornice, executed in pannelled fan-tracery, having an octagonal pendentive centre with the tracery radiating from a crisp of Gothic foliage, and terminating on the ceiling with 16 star-like points, on the margins of which are placed crockets, and on each point a finial, similar in appearance to pinnacles. Provision is made in this centre for the suspension of a chandelier. There are also four enriched ventilators in the ceiling, whose pierced centres are pendentive in a small degree. At the Western end there are three recesses, two of which having "Lancet Arches," (a style of much earlier date than those described—12th century) are to be the future doors to the vestry room and sacristy when they shall have been built; in the third is placed the altar,—this recess, or semi-elliptical alcove, is 10 feet wide, 2 feet deep, and 24 feet high, having pannelled pilasters on each side, and surrounded with an enriched canopy of a semi-octagonal form, the angles connected with carved projections serving as pinnacles and drops, and having a Tudor trefoil-pierced parapet, and quatrefoil pannelled frieze. The large Window at the Eastern end, has three massive mullions and two transoms with flowing tracery in the head; the stained glass with which it is glazed is so disposed as to produce a cross of a golden color, which is rendered more marked and more relieved by the purple stains being placed to form its immediate ground.—The harmony of the parts forms an effective whole, as far as the work has been completed. The drawings for the building were made by Mr. Teeling, Clerk in the Royal Engineer Department; the designs for the enrichments, and the details for carrying out the different parts, were furnished by Mr. O'Neill, the Clerk of the Works of the same department; and the toil-some duty of superintending and seeing that all the intentions and directions of the architect were carried into effect, devolved on the Pastor, the Rev. Mr. Murphy, to whose sound judgment, and unremitting attention, the sacred edifice owes its present forward state.

The amount already expended reaches £2,000—the estimate given in with the drawings stated £2,500 to be the probable cost, but £3,000 will probably be required.

The foliage from which the castings were made, was carved by Mr. Hart; the plastering, stucco, and castings, executed by Mr. Hickey; and the Gothic joinery, and model panneling for the centre and cornice, were the work of Mr. Griffin,—all of whom performed their respective parts in a most creditable and workmanlike manner.

The external appearance of the building, from its unfinished state, cannot be, as yet, well described,—but from the parts which have been brought into existence, a pretty fair judgment may be formed of its future appearance, when it will, undoubtedly, rival many of the edifices erected in the Fatherland under every favourable circumstance,—and considering the many disadvantages, difficulties, and obstacles, that are known and acknowledged to exist on this frontier, it is a matter of surprise to all, and an honor to the Roman Catholic community in South Africa, that an edifice of such a character and style should have been erected with the slender means available.—Cape Frontier Times.

MR. BUCKINGHAM'S LECTURES.

We cannot forego the pleasure of laying before our readers the following extract from Mr. Buckingham's inaugural lecture lately delivered in London, before the members of "The British and Foreign Institute."

It is an elegant and candid reply from a Protestant scholar, to the calumnious cant of ignorant declaimers against the ignorance and superstition of the dark ages, and the best possible refutation of the baseless assertion, that the Catholic religion, the Catholic Clergy and Catholic Princes have been ever the enemies of an enlightened education. A wonderful discovery! After centuries of Protestant declamation against the darkness and ignorance and superstition of everything Catholic, in the ages preceding the so called Reformation, it is our happy lot in the 19th century to find the most Catholic Queen of the most Catholic age, proposed as a model of every virtue that can adorn the Christian man, Queen, who, with a magnificent retinue went from Abyssinia to visit the wisest of Kings in his capital of Judea, and who, tempted by the fame of the Jewish monarch for his wisdom, as well as his magnificence, went up to Jerusalem, "to prove Solomon with hard questions," was an early example of the force of intellect, and the courage to direct it right. In Egypt, Cleopatra, the beautiful and fascinating, but not less the learned and accomplished Queen of the Ptolemies, who encouraged the learned men of all nations to visit her court, who founded the Alexandrian Library, the most splendid Collection of Books ever brought together before the invention of printing, and who could converse with the greater number of the ambassadors that approached her from all quarters, in their native tongues, was another example of the same kind; and though Cæsar, Pompey, Mark Antony, and other great generals and statesmen of her day, rivalled each other in the homage they paid to her greatness, the magic by which she chained all who approached her, seems to have been rather in the brilliance of her intellectual accomplishments, than even in the beauty of her person, or the magnificence of her court, surpassingly exquisite as was the one, and overpoweringly splendid as was the other; for the picture which the English bard has drawn of her descent down the Cydnus, is but a faithful transcript, though a beautifully coloured one, of the statements of contemporaneous historians.

"It was a saying of one of the ancients, I think Aristotle, that the human mind is like the marble in the quarry: there is no knowing the richness, beauty, and variety of the veins it may contain, till the artist brings them out by his skill, and exhibits all their lustre by his polish. The female intellect has been held to be inferior to the male, because it has not received the same amount of labour and care to bring out all its excellencies; and many a noble mind has thus lain dormant for want of aids to its development.

"But we have happily outlived this delusion like many others; and have now accumulated abundant proofs of this important truth, that the great Creator of both has made no difference, in the sexes in this respect. There are strong and weak minds in each, though not in any greater proportion in the one sex than in the other. But if the minds of the one have, for ages past, been trained to vigorous exercise, in great and ennobling themes—while the minds of the other sex have been chiefly occupied if the acquisition of mere meretricious accessories to the art of pleasing, with the slightest smattering of superficial knowledge, and that on a very limited number of subjects; with whom does the fault of feminine inferiority lie, but with those who originally established this difference in the discipline and treatment of both—and their imitators, who now hold it an unbecoming innovation to attempt to change this barbarous system, and restore woman to her fit and proper position, as the intellectual companion, the friend, and even the instructor, of man? I have always held, indeed, if any difference were desirable in the intellectual education of the sexes (save and except professional studies only,) that the superiority should be given to women, for many reasons; but among others for these: 1st—That as infancy and youth are under their especial guardianship—and as the first impressions we receive in life are the most influential and the most lasting—it is of the highest importance that these impressions should be based on the best foundations of knowledge and virtue in the mother. 2ndly—That as men, in adolescence and maturity, continue equally under the influence of women, though exercised through another medium than that of authority, but one not less powerful, namely, friendship and love, it is equally important that this should be guided by accurate conceptions of duty, and a competent knowledge of all that can engage the attention of men, and render their counsel valuable.

"Fortunately, however, we have no longer to theorize on this subject. Now and then, from time to time, in the history of the world, women have appeared in every country, and in every age, who have burst the fetters in which the tyranny of men had bound them, and asserted their own dignity by the superior force of the intellect alone. The inquiring Sheba, the Ethiopian Queen, who, with a magnificent retinue went from Abyssinia to visit the wisest of Kings in his capital of Judea, and who, tempted by the fame of the Jewish monarch for his wisdom, as well as his magnificence, went up to Jerusalem, "to prove Solomon with hard questions," was an early example of the force of intellect, and the courage to direct it right. In Egypt, Cleopatra, the beautiful and fascinating, but not less the learned and accomplished Queen of the Ptolemies, who encouraged the learned men of all nations to visit her court, who founded the Alexandrian Library, the most splendid Collection of Books ever brought together before the invention of printing, and who could converse with the greater number of the ambassadors that approached her from all quarters, in their native tongues, was another example of the same kind; and though Cæsar, Pompey, Mark Antony, and other great generals and statesmen of her day, rivalled each other in the homage they paid to her greatness, the magic by which she chained all who approached her, seems to have been rather in the brilliance of her intellectual accomplishments, than even in the beauty of her person, or the magnificence of her court, surpassingly exquisite as was the one, and overpoweringly splendid as was the other; for the picture which the English bard has drawn of her descent down the Cydnus, is but a faithful transcript, though a beautifully coloured one, of the statements of contemporaneous historians. Zenobia, the accomplished Queen of Palmyra, the magnificent ruins of whose temples and palaces still attest the unparalleled grandeur of her capital, but who ultimately graced, as a captive, the triumphal procession of her conqueror, Aurelian, through Rome, was not less remarkable for her wisdom, courage, and nobility of soul, than for her encouragement of learning and learned men; and with the profound scholar and elegant critic, Longinus, as her minister, she made her court the resort and home of all the philosophers of her day, herself among the brightest of the stars in this galaxy of wisdom and genius.

"In later days Isabella of Spain, Patroness of Literature, the friend and protector of Columbus, who, after being driven from court to court in Europe, and weighed down with despair from the "hope deferred which maketh the heart sick," found in her a friend who sold her jewels to defray the cost of his first expedition, and ever after honoured him with her attention—Isabella was another of those bright female intellects that illumined the word in her age and day. And not only was she a splendid example in her own royal person of what her sex can be, but her influence brought out from obscurity other female minds as bright as her own. Mr Prescott, in his valuable History of Ferdinand and Isabella, says, that the Queen was not only the munificent and generous patroness of education for others, but that she was herself a splendid example of learning and attainments, exciting the surprise of all around her, that she could find time for study, amongst the multitude of engrossing occupations, which the wars with the Moors, their expulsion from Granada, and the many stirring events of that romantic period, necessarily forced on one who was the ever-active director of almost all the great enterprises of her reign. Her admirable genius was the theme of general wonder as well as commendation. The celebrated Erasmus, one of the profoundest scholars of his day, calls her "a miracle of learning among her sex, and as remarkable for her piety as for her erudition." One of the most honourable proofs of her zeal for the promotion of Literature is to be found in this—that, like another Cleopatra, she was the foundress and supporter of some of the first Libraries in Spain. The education of her own children, in all the liberal knowledge of the times, and without distinction of sex—for her daughters were as well instructed as her sons—claimed her first attention, and was crowned with great success: but it was followed up by a more extended effort for the education of the young nobility of Spain; and the account of this is at once so striking and so interesting, that I venture to quote it from the volume in which it is detailed.

"Next to her family (says the historian of her reign) there was no object which the Queen had so much at heart as the improvement of the young nobility. During the troubled reign of her predecessor, they had abandoned themselves to frivolous pleasures or to a sullen apathy, from which nothing was potent enough to arouse them but the voice of war. She was obliged to relinquish her plan of amelioration, during the all engrossing struggle with Granada. But no sooner was the war brought to a close than Isabella resumed her purpose. She requested the learned Peter, Martyr of Rome, to repair to the Court, and open a school there, for the instruction of the young nobility. In an epistle addressed by him to Cardinal Mendoza, dated at Granada in April, 1492, he alludes to a promise of a liberal recompense, if he would assist in reclaiming the young cavaliers of the Court from the idle and unprofitable pursuits in which, to her great mortification, they consumed their hours; and in a subsequent letter he enlarges on the "good effects likely to result from the literary ambition exhibited by the heir-apparent, on whom the eyes of the nation were naturally turned." Martyr repaired to the Court of Isabella accordingly, and in the month of September following, in a letter dated from Saragossa, he thus speaks of his success. "My house all day long swarms with noble youths, who, reclaimed from ignoble pursuits to those of letters, are now convinced, that these, so far from being a hindrance, are rather a help in the profession of arms. I earnestly inculcate on them that consummate excellence in any department, whether of war or peace, is unattainable without science. It has pleased our royal mistress, the pattern of every exalted virtue, that her own near kinsman, the Duke of Guimaraens, as well as the young Duke of Villahermosa, the King's nephew, should remain under my roof the whole day; an example which has been imitated by the principal cavaliers of the Court, who, after attending my lectures in company with their private tutors, retire at evening to review them with these latter in their own quarters."*

"Further on, the same historian, after enumerating the many names of men of the highest rank, "who entered with the utmost zeal on such severe literary labour as few from mere love of letters are found willing to encounter," and mentioning the son of a Duke and cousin of the King, who taught in the University of Salamanca; the son of the hereditary Grand Constable of Castile, who read Lectures on Pliny and Ovid; and another, who was professor of Greek in the University of Alcalá, says, "All ages seem to catch the generous enthusiasm; and the Marquis of Denia, although turned of sixty, made amends for the sins of his youth by learning the elements of the Latin tongue, at this late period of his life. In short as Grovius remarks, in his eulogium on Lebrija, "No Spaniard was accounted noble who held science in indifference."

"That which follows, however, is still more remarkable, and more to the point, as to whether women are "out of place" for that is the contemptuous language of those who, from selfishness, illiberality, or jealous dread of their superiority, endeavour to exclude them from scientific meetings—whether they are "out of place," in the exalted sphere of literature and science. The historian goes on to say, "In this brilliant exhibition those of the other sex must not be omitted, who contributed by their intellectual endowments to the general illumination of the period. Among these, the writers of that day lavish their panegyrics on the Marchioness of Monteaugudo, and Dona Maria Pacheco, nieces of the historian Don Diego Hurtado, and daughters of the accomplished Count of Tendilla, who, while Ambassador at Rome, induced Peter Martyr to visit Spain, and who was grandson of the famous Marquis of Santillana, and nephew of the grand Cardinal. This illustrious family, rendered yet more illustrious by its merits than by its birth, is worthy of specification, as affording altogether the most remarkable combination of literary talent in the enlightened Court of Castile. The Queen's instructress in the Latin language was a lady named Dona Beatriz de Galindo—called, for her peculiar attainments, "La Latina." Another lady, Dona Lucia de Medrano, publicly lectured on the Latin Classics in the University of Salamanca; and another, Dona Francisca de Lebrija, daughter of the historian of that name, filled the chair of rhetoric with applause at Alcalá. All this (adds the historian) may be referred to the Queen's influence, who encouraged the love of study by her own example, as well as by personal attendance on the academic examinations."

"Such was the character and position of Isabella; and when we see our own beloved Queen encouraging the cultivation of letters, accomplished in her own person, and happy in the possession of a Consort worthy of her choice, who presides at the Commission of the Fine Arts, and who has consented, as his Royal Highness the Prince Albert has already graciously done, to become the Patron of this INSTITUTE, as soon as our noble President assures him of its being sufficiently advanced to warrant such a step—a position to which, by the aspect of the crowded and brilliant assemblage now before me, I think we have already attained,—why should we not hope that Victoria of England, like Isabella of Spain, may sometimes honour our Lectures with her presence, and give to our efforts a share of that distinguished favour which it is her Royal pleasure to bestow upon the other Institutions, Exhibitions, and Entertainments of the day? And if her long and happy reign shall be distinguished by an act, like that which Isabella caused to be passed, declaring that “it was prudent and honourable to permit the entry of books from all parts of the world free of duty or tax, in order that her subjects might have easy access to the fountain of wisdom from every quarter, which could not fail to benefit and ennoble the nation,”* her example would no doubt be followed by other Sovereigns, and her name rendered additionally illustrious, as the enlarger of the bounds of knowledge, and the Emancipator of literature, science, and art, from the fetters that have hitherto too long impeded the freedom of their transit from one country to another.”

LETTER NO. XXIII.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—In my last letter I strove, with all honesty and sincerity, to try the propriety and aptness of our rules of faith by the condition and capacity of children, and I leave it to your own candour and sense of justice to decide, whether I have justly and impartially weighed you in the scale, and whether you have not been found wanting when placed in the balance with reason and common sense; so that you are necessitated, by the force of circumstances, to embrace the Catholic rule, as respects children, as the only one consistent to human nature and revelation itself; let us now revert to some of the other cases referred to in my letter No. 21, and after amalgamating them as it were with our rules of faith, then analyze them by the same test as previously employed, viz. reason, and the adaption of our rules to the circumstances of mankind, leaving their proof as to their conformity to Scripture, to some future letter. Suppose, we take the second on the list, those who are unable to read, and to those we may add the blind! The blind!! why, will you tell me what is the difference, or what one iota of advantage have those who have eyes to see, but cannot read, over those who have no eyes and cannot see? Certainly, none whatever. As to their reading and examining for themselves the Bible, one in this respect is as virtually blind as the other, both stand on a par. Put a book into the hands of the first and you might as well put it into the hands of the stone blind; they can no more read than the beasts of the field. With these again, you can include man in his savage and rude state, and conjointly more than one third of the human race, it may with safety be said, are thus circumstanced. Now bring these tens of millions to the test of your rule of faith, and just fancy you hear the spirit of Protestantism thus address them. “You are first to examine the doctrine (as found in the Bible) and according to that to judge of the purity of the Church; the Scripture commands you to examine (read the Bible) and judge for yourselves; every person is to determine for himself, as well as he can, in this world, for an infallible judge in matters of faith is not necessary, every follower of Jesus Christ is called upon to exercise his own judgment in matters of religion, not to believe, like Roman Catholics, that you are to judge of doctrines by the authority and decision of the Church; every one is to examine diligently whether what he depends on for the salvation of his soul is built upon the Bible, which book ought to be in every person’s hand as the only sure rule and practice! therefore read,—read the Bible.” Nonsense, folly you will again exclaim. So indeed it is, my friends, but it is the folly and the absurdity of the principles of the Reformation. You may annex to the above description of persons again, those who can hardly spell the words of the Bible, and the dull of intellect, and are these millions of every age to be best because they cannot read or understand the Bible? Who then is to divulge to them its doctrines, or to expound to them the great mysteries of the Trinity, Incarnation, or the profound doctrines of Justification, Lord’s Supper, Baptism, and other abstruse points? What! the contradictory and fallible sects enumerated and defined in my letters on Unity? Alas! alas! are the blind to lead the blind!—are the disunited and contentious to join such classes in “unity of spirit and in the bond of peace?” are the defenders of Dissent to teach the maxim that all are to be of “one mind, one rule, one spirit,” are these sects to be taken as the “pillar and ground of truth,” the Church of the living God”? Does it stand to reason? Is it consistent to the attributes of the divinity? Even in well-educated Scotland, as it is generally reckoned, it appears by the late General Assembly’s Report on Educational Statistics, that in twenty-six parishes alone there are sixteen thousand, three hundred and forty-seven persons who can neither write nor read, and if this is so, in the year 1843, among a people who are deemed the best instructed in the world, what must be the condition of mankind through the earth’s wide domain?

* Ferdinand and Isabella, vol. II p. 207.

Yet a Rev. Scotch divine and an A. M. gives this sage counsel in a recent printed work. "It is," he says, "an excellent mode of remedying this common evil (misrepresentation) to paraphrase each sentence of Scripture to yourself in words which convey a clear meaning to your own mind, and if you are in difficulty about any word refer at once to a dictionary for its clear and established meaning, and then, by reference to other passages in the Scriptures in which the word occurs, affix to your own minds a definite meaning to it in this specific place; you will at first often times be in error, but this mode of reading steadily pursued, will ultimately land you in an accurate knowledge of the word of God." This advice is worthy of the rule! it is an admirable epitome and illustration of the system of Protestantism. It prescribes to the tens of thousands unable to read in Scotland, and to the tens of millions of uneducated but reasonable beings throughout the universe, that "the Bible ought to be in their hands, that they are to read it, and paraphrase every word of it, that Scripture commands them to do this, and to examine it and judge for themselves, and that this is the only sure rule and practice." Such is the pith of your rule,—it flies to pieces when thus brought to the test, like corroded steel when brought to the grinding stone. It is rotten and unsound. Unhappy mortals! miserable millions of every age!! wretched thousands that die daily in this uneducated state!!! what is to be your fate if this is true?—if your salvation rested upon this rule? A strong impulse moves me here to appeal to the divine legislature of man, and ask, "merciful Jesus! have you doomed us to this fate? that it is obligatory upon us, thy divine command, that we must personally examine, and judge of the doctrines of the Bible by our own reading and private judgment? Is it upon this condition that you "would have all men to be saved," and yet left the great bulk of mankind so circumstanced that the rule becomes futile from its impracticability? I feel, gracious Redeemer, that it would be the highest profanity and blasphemy to say it, and impiety itself to believe it; though, O Lord, you come not to us, as you came to Moses "in the darkness of a cloud," and issued not to us your command under the awful form of thunder and lightning, as you appeared upon Mount Sinai, when you delivered your laws to your servant, Moses, that "the people might believe in him and obey his words," yet you came to us under a form not to terrify our senses, but to enchant and engage our souls; you came to us as a Redeemer, as a Pleader, as a self-immolated victim, and your infinity of love for man brought you to stoop to an infinity of misery; and you said, yes, sweet Jesus, you said of the Pastors of your Church — "He that heareth you, heareth me, and he that despiseth you, despiseth me." You said again, "if he will not hear the Church, let him be to thee as the heathen and the publican," and your great Apostle, Paul, tells your people, "obey your Prelates (Overseers) and be subject to them; for they watch as being to render an account of your souls," and in another place he says of you, "And he gave some Apostles, and some Prophets, and other some Pastors and Doctors; that henceforth we be no more children tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine by the wickedness of men." See in this, ye thousands and ye millions, who are unable to read, how universal is the mercy and love of Jesus. See in this how He embraces within his saving arms, the young and the old, the learned and the ignorant, the rich and the poor, the civilized and the savage. As the rays of the Sun fall to give light, warmth and life to all indiscriminately, so does the rule of his salvation form as it were an halo of light from which all may derive light, grace and life. Man has only to hear and to obey; he may close his eyes, he may be blind, he may be ignorant, he may be in the rude state of nature, like the diamond in the mine, unpolished, but he may be like it, pure and uncontaminated, for we read, that the greatest man born of woman, was a wanderer in the desert, lived on locusts and wild honey. If God, then, has blessed man with the faculty of hearing or understanding, his soul is open to receive the word of life from the Pastors of the Church of the living God. What, my friends, can we compare it to, it is so exquisitely beautiful? It may be said that it is like a flower to which it is immaterial whether it grows in the unfrequented valley or well-cultivated garden, whether it blossoms upon the banks of the roaring torrent, in the dark forest, or finds a place in the highly tended nursery ground, perhaps it only becomes the purer, the further it is removed from the haunts of the busy and civilized world. So is this divine rule; it is suited to the palace and to the desert, to the learned and to the unlettered, to the sage and to the simple, in a word, to all classes of men. It is by it that "God would have all men to be saved." Such is the rule of the Catholic Church; it is so simple, so clear and so "straight," that as the Prophet says, "fools even cannot err therein." It was by it, as enjoined by Christ, "Go and teach all nations," that St. Peter converted on one occasion by word of mouth "about three thousand." It was by it that our Pagan and ignorant ancestors were converted to Christianity. It was by it that St. Xavier converted the thousands of India, and it is by it that the devoted Missionaries of Catholic France are now spreading the Gospel among the nations of China. I shall take up the thread of this in my next.

Yours faithfully,
C. A. C.

Selections.

THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

The Calcutta Christian Advocate, in an article on what it calls "Sil's College and the Jesuits," takes occasion to say:—

"We have already expressed our views fully on this subject, for which we have been taken to task, as we anticipated, by the Catholic Herald in his usual gentlemanly style. Our cotemporary it seems has discovered a suitable advocate and coadjutor in the Calcutta Star, from whose columns we are treated with a long lecture on the subject of Sil's College. In order to save our Catholic friend the expense of reprinting such long extracts from the Star in future, if indeed it be for our special benefit that he does so, we may tell him once for all that we attach just as much importance generally, to the opinions of the Star in regard to religion and education, as we do to his own, and that a condemnation of our sentiments and proceedings from that quarter, affects us much in the same way as the many columns of condemnation, with which we have been favoured by the Herald."

If the Advocate would be spared that censure we are too frequently compelled to bestow on its columns, it must become more Christian in its religion and more measured in its language. There may be some excuse for a lay journal if it occasionally betray a violence that never helps an argument, but for a purely religious paper there can be none. We endeavour to control our pen whenever writing on subjects to which we have been invited by the improper tone of the Advocate, and which never must pass unreprieved: if we do not always succeed we are sorry for it, but on the occasion in question we certainly wrote nothing that ought to have excited the anger, or any declaration of contempt, from our self-satisfied contemporary, who we are compelled to say preaches Christ and practices the Pharisee. The Advocate would appear to think that when he says he cares as little for our opinion as for the Catholic Herald's, it is tantamount to proving that he is right and we both wrong, but this, we assure him, is a delusion: such a reply in the place of argument would be discreditable to the good sense of a school boy, while its spirit is exceedingly unbecoming a full grown Minister. Were he really convinced that we are wrong when we differ from him, it would be more becoming in him to speak in terms of kindly persuasion; if he found us impracticable he should pass us by unnoticed. It is due to the worldly respectability of his cloth—to say nothing of the sacred profession to which he belongs—that he should not strut about in ruffled feathers. Why will he not remember the parable that was spoken to certain men "which trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others." Instead of doing so he is strong in himself, and thanks God he is not like us. We grieve for the spirit that characterizes the Calcutta Christian Advocate. Its conductors appear to suppose the whole duty of Protestant Ministers is to denounce the Roman Catholic Faith. Why will they not do justice to their own, and if incidentally they have to expose the errors of other creeds, let them do it: instead of this they are perpetually shying at the Pope as if he were a Shrovetide cock, and Jesuitism is a thing more gratuitously and rancorously pursued by them than Chartism in the political world by the rankest Tory writers. We have over and over again said that our belief is the Protestant religion—with Ministers commonly honest in their calling—as, thank God, we believe the vast majority to be, must make its way against all adverse creeds, and this is one of those opinions which the reverend gentlemen of the Advocate despise. We are sorry for it; we have a firm reliance on it, and if we thought otherwise we would look out for any faith that seemed to us to have in it that inherent principle of truth which no sophistry, no delusions, no persecutions could eventually crush.

We must entreat the Editors of the Calcutta Christian Advocate—for we believe there are three or four, to reform their Editorial practices all altogether, and to endeavour to make Protestant Christians by some other means than frightening them from becoming Catholics. Above all we do, without a particle of angry feeling, beseech them to abjure the coarse, personal tone that has long characterized their journal, and which would be unpardonable even in men who had taken up Christianity as a trade—of whom unfortunately there are too many.—Calcutta Star, Oct. 22.

HIEROLOGUS; OR, THE CHURCH TOURISTS.

By the Rev. J. M. Neale, London: 1843.

Our attention was first drawn to this charming little work by an extract from it which we met in one of the literary journals. We purpose to devote to it a few pages of our present number; and in order to secure in our reader the same feeling with which we ourselves perused the volume, we shall commence by transcribing the passage.

“ Oh, the good old times of England! ere, in her evil day,
From their holy faith and their ancient rites
her people fell away!
When her gentlemen had hands to give, and her yeomen hearts to feel;
And they raised up many a bead-house, but never a bastile;
And the poor they honoured, for they knew that He who for us bled,
Had seldom, when He came on earth, whereon to lay His head;
And by the poor man's dying bed the holy pastor stood,
To fortify the parting soul with that celestial food;
And in the mortal agony the priest ye might behold,
Commending to his Father's hands a sheep of His own fold;

And when the soul was fled from earth, the Church could do yet more,
For the chaunting priests came slow in front, and the cross went on before;
And o'er the poor man's pall they bade the sacred banner wave,
To teach her sons that Holy Church hath victory o'er the grave.

“ But times and things are altered now; and Englishmen begin

To class the beggar with the knave, and poverty with sin;

We shut them up from tree and flower, and from the blessed sun;

We tear in twain the hearts that God in wedlock had made one,—

The hearts that beat so faithfully, reposing side by side,

For fifty years of weal and woe from eve till morning-tide:

No gentle nun with her comfort sweet, no friar standeth nigh,

With ghostly strength and holy love to close the poor man's eye;

But the corpse is thrown into the ground, when the prayers are hurried o'er,

To rest in peace a little while, and then make way for more!

“ We mourn not for our abbey-lands; 't'is pass they as they may!

But we moan because the tyrant found a richer spoil than they!

He cast away, as a thing defiled, the remembrance of the just;

And the relics of our martyrs he scattered to the dust;

Yet two at least, in their holy shrines, escaped
the spoiler's hand,

And St. Cuthbert and St. Edward might alone redeem a land!

“ And still our litanies ascend like incense, as before;

And still we hold the one full faith Nicæa taught of yore;

And still our children, duly plunged in the baptismal flood,

‘ Of water and the Holy Ghost, are born the sons of God;’

And still our solemn festivals from age to age endure,

And wedded troth remains as firm, and wedded love as pure;

And many an earnest prayer ascends from many a hidden spot;

• And England's Church is Catholic, though
England's self be not!

“ England of Saints! the hour is nigh—for nigh-er may it be

Than yet I deem, albeit that day I may not live to see,—

When all thy commerce, all thy arts, and wealth, and power, and fame,

Shall melt away—at thy most need—like wax
before the flame;

Then shalt thou find thy truest strength thy martyrs' prayers above;

Then shalt thou find thy truest wealth thine
holy deeds of love;

And thy Church, awaking from her sleep
come glorious forth at length,

• And in sight of men and angels display her hidden strength :

Again shall long processions sweep through Lincoln's minster pile ;

Again shall banner, cross, and cope, gleam through the incensed aisle ;

And the faithful dead shall claim their part in the Church's thoughtful prayer,

And the daily sacrifice to God be duly offered there ;

And tierce, and noones, and matins, shall have each their holy lay ;

And the Angelus at Compline shall sweetly close the day !

“ England of Saints ! the peace will dawn,—but not without the fight ;

So, come the contest when it may,—and God defend the right ! ”—pp. 102-3.

So thoroughly Catholic is the tone that pervades this beautiful ballad, so undisguised the regret for the religious revolution which England has undergone, and so unconcealed the longing for the return of the “ holy faith and ancient rites ” which have passed away, that it needs the assurance of the title-page to make one believe that the author is a zealous Anglican clergyman who begins his work with a formal submission of all it contains to the judgement of Sanctissimæ Matris Nostre Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ ! Ten years since, which of us would have credited this ? We live, indeed, in wondrous times,—full of consolation, but still more of responsibility, for us all. Pray God there be no coldness, or ill example, or other deficiency on our part, to neutralise or impede the extraordinary impulse which the truth is daily receiving from quarters where it would least be expected to possess a representative !

We have long been watching with secret pleasure, the gradual spread among the Anglican body, of the feeling which is represented in Mr. Neale's volume—a love of what they call the “ æsthetics of Catholic art.” The architectural articles in the British Critic, the Quarterly Review, the Ecclesiologist, and the other publications of the Camden Society, have insensibly produced a complete revolution among the clergy ; and the numberless churches daily erected or restored in accordance with the principles of art which it thus sought to revive, are exerting a corresponding influence upon the less educated classes, to an extent which it would be vain to expect from any amount of instruction. We are far from attaching any great importance to this revolution of sentiment for its own sake. Unquestionably with many it is a thing of fashion or of impulse. We think it is Wieland, who tells that the people of Abdera,—the butt of all the humourists of the classic times,—once took it into their heads to build a fountain in one of the squares of their city. It was to surpass anything of the kind ever before erected. The most celebrated artists of Greece were employed in the work. All the finest attic models were canvassed and compared. Paros and Pentelicus gave their richest marbles ; Corinth supplied its choicest brass, and the studios of Athens were ransacked for appropriate ornaments. Public expectation was excited to the highest pitch ; the public purse was stretched to the utmost limits of liberality ; and when at length the scaffolds were taken down and the screens removed, it was universally admitted that the artists had surpassed themselves. The design of the fountain, was inimitable, the materials were of the finest quality, the execution was perfect.

In a word, only one thing had been forgotten—there was no water ! Now we believe there can be no doubt that there are numbers of the noisiest advocates of Catholic art who are precisely in this predicament ;—who devote their whole energies to its external forms—to rood-screens and east windows, and choir-stalls and sedilia—and lavish all their care on the decoration of the material fountain, forgetting that its only real value is to preserve and transmit the “ water springing up into life everlasting.” But we also believe, and Mr. Neale's book is a gratifying evidence, that there are many more with whom the feeling lies deeper—in whose minds the eternal symbols have a profound meaning, and in whose hearts the beautiful and expressive forms of Catholic art have awakened a loving longing desire, to know and realize the great truths which are symbolised therein. We agree with Mr. Neale, that “ although the re-introduction of copes will not give a man faith or penitence, or put him into that frame of mind in which he may be a meet receiver of the Holy Eucharist, it will teach him that those who order its use, and those who minister in it, consider that mystery as something apart from, and higher than, the other offices of their Church. We do not say that a golden chalice and paten will of themselves lead any one to realize the awfulness of “ verily and indeed taking and receiving ” the Body and Blood of the Saviour ; but it will, at least, teach him, that those who have provided them, consider that Bread and that Wine as worthy of all reverence. We do not imagine that altar candlesticks can by themselves lead a man to keep his eyes fixed on Him that is the Light of the Gentiles, and the glory of Israel ; but they will, at least, set before him the altar as a most sacred spot,—a spot not only, as the rest of the church, to be kept from profanation, but to be looked on as even more holy than the other portions of God's temple. We do not think that the rood-screen, by itself, will make any man feel the essentiality of an apostolical succession, or the benefit of priestly absolution ; but it will, at least, practically teach him the difference between the clergy and the laity, when he sees the different position of the two classes in the church.” It is, for these and other ulterior consequences to which in our opinion, it inevitably leads, and not of any extraordinary value which attaches to itself, that we feel a deep interest in the study of Ecclesiology, so popular of late years with all classes of English churchmen.

The Hierologus, however, is not a regular treatise on the subject. Its plan is very simple. Though the author manages to convey, in a familiar and attractive form, most of the principles of Christian art as applied to church architecture, yet he does not profess to lay down rules, or enter into technical details, but simply to inspire a love for the study, and a due appreciation of its excellence and importance. With this view, therefore, he has put together, somewhat after the manner of Isaac Walton's Complete Angler, a series of conversations descriptive of a tour to some of the most interesting of the English churches, in which he contrives, with much simplicity, but yet, we think, with very considerable success, to develop, partly from the churches which he visits, partly from an immense number of others with which he compares them, the most important characteristics of the Gothic and Saxon architecture. Some idea may be formed of his industry and research, from the fact that he refers, for the purpose of illustration, to more than three hundred churches (the greater number of which he has himself visited), not only in these countries, but in France, Spain, Belgium, and wherever else the Gothic architecture has left traces of its existence.

It is not our intention to examine Mr. Neale's book in a critical spirit; for although there are a few—indeed very few—expressions which we had rather seen omitted, and a few technical details in which we should feel obliged to dissent from him; yet we do not think it fair to detain the reader by punctilious exceptions, or over-nice discussions of questions of art, from the far more interesting matter with which his pages abound. We shall not pretend, therefore, to follow the order of his tour, or to dwell upon those parts of it which are technical or descriptive: our business is with his own views and opinions, far more than with the matter-of-fact information he has collected. And, indeed, the Catholic reader can so seldom meet any book of this description which does contain, in every page, an admixture of bigotry far more than neutralizing all the pleasure or profit to be derived from its perusal, that we shall readily be excused if we yield to the temptation of showing that there are some who can write in a kindlier strain; and who, though they be not of our body, yet can sympathise with us under the calumnies to which we are constantly exposed, and share our indignation at the "horrible profanity" of the olden school of "church tourists."

The contrast will be best illustrated by an anecdote which the author himself takes occasion to relate. He is speaking of the numberless representations of the passion of our Saviour which are to be met in all the ancient ecclesiastical monuments:

"I think the piety of our ancestors shines more conspicuously in nothing than in those constant references to the passion of our Saviour. I remember once at Cambridge, after having been informed, in the Sunday afternoon sermon at St. Mary's, that till the Reformation, nothing whatever was known or thought of the Atonement, that I went into King's College chapel. It was a bright evening in autumn: and there at the east end, as if closing the magnificent vista of the deeds of saints and martyrs portrayed in the side windows, and forming the life and soul of all, and attracting the eye through all the rest to itself, brought out into the strongest possible relief, hung the image of our crucified Redeemer, as if to convict the preacher of the calumny he had just uttered."—p. 73.

The following conversation among the ruins of the abbey of Croyland is even more interesting. We should premise that the main weight of the dialogue is borne by two imaginary personages, Palæophilus (the author) and Catholicus;—two or three other characters being occasionally introduced, all of whom, however, except one named Prædictus, belong to the same school with the writer himself:

"Catholicus.—And so this is all that remains of the once mired abbey of our Lady and St. Cuthbert! And so it was to this spot that cavalades of pilgrims came up, and paid their devotions at that splendid shrine, glittering magnificently with rubies and sapphires and pearls of the East, set in their fretwork of gold; where the unquenched lamps hung carved in the same precious metal, and fragrant with the costliest oils; where, day by day, the commemorative sacrifice was offered up—day by day, at sunrise, Te Deum was sung—day by day prayers arose for all sects and conditions of men in holy Church—day by day remembrance was made of the departed faithful—day by day alms and ghostly consolations were dispensed to the widow, the fatherless, and him that had no helper. And now the altar and its gorgeous screens are passed, as a fretwork of rubied clouds flies away at nightfall; the shrine has been parted among the rapacious destroyers,—the holy dust it contained scattered to the winds,—the daily sacrifice taken away,—the glorious church a dangerous ruin, except that portion of it which the niggardliness of the inhabitants is legally compelled to keep up,—the nave, where the solemn procession swept forth, tenanted by nettles and reptiles,—and the choir scarcely to be traced by the green mound which marks the boundary foundation."

"Palæophilus.—I have often thought how admirably that description of the prophet, THE ABOMINATION THAT MAKETH DESOLATE, (which the fanatics of Ereter Hall apply, I believe, to the Roman church;) describes the feelings and acts of Puritanism. Desolation there is, indeed, in all of them: man is isolated by them—cut off from communion with bygone ages,—forbidden to believe in his fellowship with departed saints,—scorned at for showing care of future generations, by providing enduring shrines for their worship,—his warmest feelings, his brightest hopes, his highest affections, are all made desolate."—pp. 16, 17.

There are many in whose mouths this would be little more than an idle outburst of poetical indignation, without any higher object than to enliven a tedious chapter or round off a pretty paragraph. But it is not so with Mr. Neale. It is impossible to doubt the sincerity of his enthusiasm. He pursues through the remaining portion of this chapter—and with a degree of warmth which cannot but be real—the melancholy history of the sacrileges which accompanied the change of religion in England, and of the visible judgments with which Providence appears, in many cases, to have visited their perpetrators. One of the instances to which he refers is that of Breadshall Priory, in Derbyshire. The old religious occupants, a body of Augustinian monks, were ejected in 1553; and it would seem as if from that hour the property brought a curse with it to every subsequent possessor. The original grantee, under Edward VI, was Henry Duke of Suffolk. He was beheaded for high treason, and since his time the property has changed hands, by a variety of visitations and fatalities, no less than thirteen times; having passed, before the commencement of the present century, through the hands of twelve different families!

But the best evidence of Mr. Neale's sincerity in deploring that "the former things have passed away," is the satisfaction with which he contemplates the prospect of their restoration.

"Pal. I have sometimes amused myself with imagining the effect which would be produced, could the old religious, their revenues, edifices, and inhabitants start up at once into full vigour and activity.

"Cath. Imagine, for example, the impulse which would be given to the Church principle in a place like Leeds, if Kirkstall, at the distance of less than two miles, were suddenly restored! The continual services, the active exertions of the religious in the haunts of vice and misery, the ~~alm-giving~~ the attendance on diseases as well spiritual as corporeal,—to what happy effects might they not lead!

"Pal. You have chosen a happy instance for producing immediate effect. But there is no doubt the manufacturing districts would be the first to profit from so glorious a revival. Cells would be planted from the larger houses, in the immediate neighbourhood of such towns as Birmingham, Liverpool, Rochdale, Manchester, and Bradford; and such counties as Cornwall—where for one church-town there are five or six hamlets without a church—would derive immediate benefit. The system must be a little altered: the Church would adapt herself, as she has ever done, to the existing wants of the country; the ceremonial in the larger houses would be less splendid at first; the attendance of priests less numerous; for even the immense resources of St. Alban's, St. Edmundsbury, or Reading, or Westminster, or Glastonbury, would be unequal at first to the providing new churches, or sending forth those whom we might almost call missionaries, in sufficient numbers.

"Cath. The hospitals, too, and free chapels, destroyed at the Reformation, would be of inestimable value. Well, though these things cannot be restored, there can be no doubt that the monastic system will, sooner or later—but I think very soon—find its way into the English Church. Difficulties there will be at first; imagine the horrible outcry which will be raised, from John O'Groat's house to the Land's End, against it. But was it not St. Philip Neri, who, when asked to join in any scheme, was wont to ask, 'Is it much opposed?' And if answered in the negative, then he would reply, 'I can have nothing to do with it, for it cannot be good.'—pp. 27-8.

MISCELLANEA.

The Univers publishes the following letter from the frontiers of Persia:—"Some unexpected incidents have fortunately modified the unpleasant anticipations which the last news from Persia caused relative to the mission of Ourmiah. Whilst one of the Lazarists, M. Darnis, was sent towards the frontier by roads invested by the tribe Bubassi, of the Kurds, and whilst the Catholics of the canton of Ourmiah were exposed to all kind of bad treatment, M. Cluzel, the other missionary, who had been likewise condemned to exile, reached the capital in disguise, naturally thinking that this violent measure could not have been dictated by the Government of the Schah, who was too just, and too much the friend of the French, to treat them so harshly, but that it had been dictated by some other influence, systematically inimical to Catholicity. M. Cluzel was not in error. On his arrival at Teheran he discovered some singular intrigues, which were sufficient to inflict disgrace on the American Methodists and on the Russian representative, Count Medem. The Prime Minister received with distinction our Missionary and the ten winter-bearded deputies of the canton of Ourmiah who accompanied him. Their complaints were favourably received, and they were assured that a second firman would be despatched to the Governor of Aderbitjan, to prevent the first firman from being executed. The second firman will afford a tardy relief to the afflictions and tears of our poor Catholics, but it will not restore to life those who have suffered. It will nevertheless disturb the joyful festival of the Methodists. Let us hasten to announce that the American Protestant missionaries were premature in boasting that they would be supported by Colonel Sheil. They did in effect apply to him, but having failed, they as a last resort appealed to the good-will of Count Medem. Colonel Sheil has demonstrated that the cordial understanding proclaimed between the Governments of France and England is not a vain title, and, moreover, he appears to have remembered that he is an Irishman, and brother of the celebrated Catholic orator. We, therefore, were in error when we doubted of the honour of this gentleman. M. Cluzel placed himself under his protection, not as a missionary, but as the subject of an ally of England, and having, if necessary, a right to his protection. Some proposals for a reconciliation have been made to M. Cluzel by his enemies, but he has refused them, waiting, with confidence in the justice of his cause, the arrival of the Count de Sartiges, whom Providence appears to have sent designedly to maintain in Persia the rights of religious liberty, and the honour of the French name."—Tablet.

DONCASTER.—The erection of a new Catholic Church in this neat and elegant town has been determined upon, an event which has long been earnestly desired. Ground has been secured for the new erection. We heartily wish God speed to our zealous friends, and trust that the erection will be such as to do credit to their zeal and to the ancient town of Doncaster.—Ibid.

[VOL. VII.

REV. C. MURPHY, SECUNDERABAD.

A kind friend has favoured us with the annexed address, presented to Rev. Mr. Murphy, by the Catholic soldiers of H. M. 4th Regiment, on the occasion of his removal to Kamptee, to take the place of the late lamented Rev. Mr. Breen. We subjoin also, the answer of Mr. Murphy to the address. It is most gratifying to every good Catholic, to find so many public attestations, as we have had the good fortune to record in our journal, of the endearing and sacred friendship which the Catholic clergy and their flocks cherish for each other. This holy attachment of charity is the grand characteristic badge, by which the Saviour desired that the world should recognise his faithful followers. Wheresoever this is found, there will truth be sure to triumph, despite of every obstacle, which worldly power or calumny can oppose. A few months only have elapsed since Rev. Mr. Murphy, was removed from St. Thomas' Mount, Madras, amidst the tears and lamentations of a numerous and devoted flock of Europeans, East Indians and Natives, to Secunderabad. Their grief at his departure from St. Thomas' Mount, was recorded in the affecting address, which his flock then presented to him. Nor was that sorrow transitory, for, we know, that the recollection of his many virtues is tenderly and gratefully preserved to the present day. Indeed, it would be dishonorable to his former flock, if this were not the case. For during Mr. Murphy's ministry at the Mount, that truly good priest not only reclaimed many sinners from their evil ways and promoted a love of Christian perfection among the good, but, by an astonishing effect of the power of truth and of divine grace, he gained over to the fold of the true Church about two hundred poor souls, who were previously immersed in the darkness of paganism or heresy. The copious benediction which attended his labors at St. Thomas' Mount accompanied his ministry also at Secunderabad. For, during the eight months of his mission there, he, aided by the virtue, experience and talents of his distinguished relative, the Rev. D. Murphy, had the happiness of witnessing thirty-four heathens and ten Protestants received into the Catholic Church. It gives us great pleasure to add, that Rev. C. Murphy was one of the pious band of ecclesiastics, who accompanied our venerated Archbishop from Ireland to Madras, and received there from his Grace the holy order of priesthood.

ADDRESS.

The Rev. C. Murphy, Secunderabad.

REV. SIR,—We the Roman Catholics of H. M. 4th Regiment, hear, with the deepest feelings of regret, your departure from amongst us. We can assure you, that we cannot find language strong enough to express to you, our sorrow at this unexpected event; for since your arrival at this station, your kind and affectionate disposition, together with your piety and zeal in the cause of religion, has endeared you to the heart of every Catholic belonging to this regiment.

The Teetotalers, in particular, beg to tender to you their warmest acknowledgments for your efforts in their cause, since your arrival at Secunderabad; and we further congratulate our Catholic brethren at Kamptee upon your appointment to that station, and at the same time express our feelings of sorrow, at the demise of your late worthy predecessor, the Rev. J. Breen.

In conclusion, we beg to present you with the small sum of Rupees 200, (two hundred,) as a trifling token of our gratitude and respect for the many favours we in general experienced from your hand in the discharge of your sacred ministry. We shall continue to offer up our prayers to the throne of Divine Grace, for your safe arrival at your destination; and that your life may be prolonged, to labor as you have heretofore done in the vineyard of the Lord, to the edification of all those who have had the pleasure of your acquaintance, is the prayer of your affectionate friends of H. M. 4th Regiment.

On behalf of the Catholics,
Secunderabad, } (Signed) C. SMITH.

REPLY.

MY DEAR AND WORTHY FRIENDS,—Your very kind and flattering address, your liberal and generous subscription, the fullness and moral respectability of your meeting, call forth from me the warmest expressions of my heart. When, at your request, I promised meet you in this hall previous to my departure from you, I had not the slightest idea that you were to present me with such valuable testimonials of your affection and esteem. My worthy friends, you have overrated my merits, and lavished more praises on me, than I deem myself worthy of, but this I attribute to your own kind and generous hearts. When I consider your disinterested zeal, and kind co-operation with your pastors, your charitable and liberal subscriptions towards the families of your brother comrades, who fell either in the field in behalf of their Queen and Country, or, from the effects of an oppressive climate are prematurely hurried to the grave; the large amount of your subscriptions to propagate the faith of Christ, and erect the standard of the Cross on the ruins of Idolatry, you can conceive, better than I can express, how much I must feel at being removed from you. You were kindly pleased to state your regret at my departure, but I assure you, I equally feel sorrow at being separated from you, and nothing but obedience to my superior, could sever the link that binds us. This beautiful Temperance Hall, so lately established, and so splendidly enlarged at your expense, bears ample testimony of that unanimity of feeling, and that cordiality which reign triumphant amongst you. The spacious school you have built in addition to this Temperance Hall, for the instruction of youth, in the faith of their forefathers, cannot but gain for you the estimation, of every liberal minded man, whilst your pure motives for doing so will gain for you greater rewards when the innocent prayers of the protected young will ascend before the throne of the Most High, in your behalf. I have been much edified by your piety and regularity in complying with your religious duties, and I am delighted beyond expression at the idea that you will remember me in your pious prayers.

In conclusion, I return you my sincerest thanks for these mementos of your regard and esteem for me, and rest assured I will always remember you with gratitude and esteem.

BURIAL GROUND AND FREE SCHOOL AT HOWRAH.

We have been requested to notice that the Rev. Paul da Gradosi, M. A. C. the Pastor of the Howrah Catholic Church, seeing the necessity for a Burial place at Howrah, proposes purchasing a piece of ground for the purpose. It is intended for the interment of Christians of all denominations; the only distinction to be made is in the allotment of a portion of the ground solely for Catholic Burials as distinguished from the burials of other Christians. Monuments will be allowed to be erected on the ground on payment of fees. The Rev. father proposes also to establish a Free School at Howrah for the benefit of the poor,—and to carry out these very necessary and charitable designs, he earnestly solicits the assistance of the public.

The Rev. gentleman deserves great credit for the building of the Howrah Church, erected entirely through his own exertions and for the most part at his own expense. The clock which now adorns the steeple, procured likewise through his own exertions, must be of great benefit, both to the residents of Howrah and Snlkea, and to the shipping in the river. We hope, therefore that, as the Rev. father has some claim on the public, his call for aid towards the accomplishment of the objects he has in view will be readily responded to.

CHINSURAH.

The Sacrament of Confirmation was administered on Sunday last to upwards of twenty of the military now stationed at Chinsurah by the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe.

FORT WILLIAM.

The same divine rite was performed in Fort William on Tuesday last, when between forty and fifty of H. M.'s 10th Regt. were confirmed by the above-named Right Rev. Prelate, and received holy communion at his hands.

FEVER HOSPITAL.

We lay before our readers, with much pleasure, the following letter to the Archbishop, from the respected Secretary to the Council of Education, and we feel assured that the anticipations of the Council will be fully realized.

THE MOST REV. DR. CAREW,

•Vicar Apostolic.

MY LORD,—I am directed by the Council of Education to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated 14th October, with its enclosure, and to return you their best and most sincere thanks, for the very kind and prompt manner in which you have responded to their appeal in behalf of so good and great an object. They doubt not that your eloquent appeal to the charitable feelings of the Catholic Community will be attended with success, and effect much good in a cause in which all men of feeling and humanity must have a deep and sincere interest.

I have the honor to be, my Lord,

Your most obdt. Servt.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE--ORDINATION.

The first ceremony of the kind that has, we understand, ever taken place in Bengal, was performed yesterday, All Saints' Day, in the neat chapel of St. John's College. Four of the Ecclesiastical Students whom Bishop Olliffe brought out to India, viz. Messrs. Tracy, Prendergast, Oshea, and McCabe, received Minor Orders at his Lordship's hands—they had received the tonsure on the previous day. On both these occasions the Rev. Mr. Forinosa assisted as Archdeacon to the officiating Prelate. The ceremony was very impressive, but is only a prelude to a more solemn one, which is to take place before Christmas, when two of the above students, Messrs. Tracy and Prendergast, will be ordained priests. We congratulate our fellow Catholics on this approaching accession to our Missionary body.

HILL TRIBES AT CACHAR.

The following edifying letter will be perused with interest:—

TO THE RIGHT REV. DOCTOR CAREW, Archbishop of Edessa, and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.
Cachar, 15th October, 1844.

MOST REVEREND LORD,—I humbly beg your Grace's pardon for not having, agreeably to my promise, addressed your Lordship sooner on the subject of the Hill Tribes, who inhabit the mountains which surround this valley. The Reverend Mr. Freycenon, sent by your Grace to visit Sylhet, having been so charitable as to come so far up at our earnest request and invitation to help us with the consoling assistance of his Holy Ministry, this happy circumstance has brought to our recollection the above promise.

All the details respecting these people that we can give your Grace in so short a letter is that they have no religion, excepting a very strong fear of an evil spirit, whom they designate by the name of Deo, and propitiate by offering sacrifices of animals, &c. It appears that the difficulty a Missionary would have principally to overcome, would be to break this fear. To our certain knowledge the tribe called Nagah are an inoffensive people, and peaceably disposed; a charitable Missionary would have no probable danger to apprehend in going among them, and we lean much to the opinion, that, with the blessing of God, his mission would eventually prove successful. In confirmation of this opinion we have much pleasure in announcing to your Grace that the Reverend Mr. Freycenon, during the short stay with which he has honoured us, has already sown the seeds for the conversion to our holy religion of two women of that nation, and were he to remain a few days more, it is very probable he might bring over more.

We cannot but sincerely approve of the selection your Grace has been pleased to make of the Reverend Mr. Freycenon to visit Sylhet. The long and painful mission he has undertaken in China during many years, and the zeal with which he has performed the task imposed upon him by your Grace of bringing back from the valley of the shadow of death into the light of salvation the numerous Christians in Ossounpoor, Sylhet and Bonassill, so long abandoned to themselves, and who had degenerated into the grossest Mussulman and Hindoo superstitions, and his knowledge of various languages and also of Medicine, seem to point him out as the fit instrument for so laborious and tiresome an undertaking as the conversion of these hill tribes. Accordingly we communicated to him our ideas on the subject and explained every thing,—he appeared very willing indeed to undertake this mission and suffer again in these mountains in the cause of our holy religion; but he told us that without your Grace's command and blessing he would do nothing.

Whatever may be your Grace's determination, we humbly beg leave to repeat, my Lord, what we had the honor of telling your Grace when in Calcutta in March last, that we would be but too happy to render every assistance and help in our power to the reverend gentleman, and that our house, servants and everything we have, will be entirely at his service and at your Grace's command. We pray God to pour on your Grace His blessing, and earnestly beg to recommend ourselves to the prayers of your Grace and benediction.

I remain, my Lord,

With profound respect,

Your Grace's

Most obedient and humble servant,

G. DE FOUCHY.

P. S. My eldest brother particularly soli-cits your Grace's prayers, for he has completely lost his sight. We are in hopes that the Reverend Mr. Freycenon will deign to say Mass here on Sunday next.

CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE—CHUNAR.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—I was pleased to observe, by one of your late issues, that our Dum Dum friends have again been bestirring themselves, and with their accustomed liberality, in favour of the Catholic Orphanage. Too much credit (and that will be their smallest recompense) cannot be theirs who so manage their limited means as to find themselves enabled, gratefully to render back to the Almighty Giver, some humble offering from the little which it has been His pleasure to entrust to them. The Orphanage merits the warmest support of every Catholic, and in a more particular manner, of every Catholic Soldier, and it were much to be desired, that some system could be adopted of establishing in every regiment, and at every station in the Bengal Presidency, a monthly subscription in favour of so deserving an institution. By this means an income might be secured, which could be calculated upon: it would, in all likelihood, be of small amount, but it would be regular, and need not necessarily hinder the periodical collections now made. The Catholic soldiers have hitherto built their own Chapels, maintained their own establishments, and, in great part, supported their own Priests; and are now, under the happy auspices of our excellent Archbishop, making a further effort in the cause of their religion, by their endeavour to ensure for the Catholic Soldiers' Orphans, a Catholic Education. The funds of the state are so deeply taxed to maintain the persuasion of one half of its servants, that nothing can be spared for the religion of the other half. It was not, however, by the aid of government funds the Catholic Church attained her preeminence, but in despite of them; and now, how consolatory it is to witness the sincerity and attachment of her children, as instanced in their establishment and maintenance of the Catholic Orphanage, to save their children from the Government Asylum, admission into which, is unobtainable for a Catholic child, except on the condition of apostasy.

Father Marcellinus, the Apostolic Missionary at Ghazepore, favoured us with a visit here early in August, and passed the greater part of the month with us; when he was obliged to return to his station, earlier than he had intended, in consequence of learning that disease was busy among his flock of H. M. 29th Regiment. It is the second visit we have received from Mr. Marcellinus since his appointment, and much we wish, his stay could have been prolonged, or that it could be more frequently repeated. The first could not be accorded, for sickness cried to him; and such petitioner never cried in vain to the Catholic Priest, who will ever be found a ready attendant at the couch of sickness, directing the spirit's last moments on earth to the eternity to which she is hastening; and the distance of this place from Ghazepore, with the expense of travelling, is too great an obstacle in the way of a poor friar, to be encountered as often as his flock or himself would wish.

But that the Bengal Vicariate does not comprise our station, I should long since have written to you on the very great hardship we labour under, in our want of the consolation and guidance of a resident Priest among us; and I advert to it now, in the hope that the subject may meet with the notice of His Lordship the Bishop at Agra, who from the priests expected out with Dr. Borghi, may be able to nominate one to the duties of a station, which is the last resting place on earth to so many old soldiers; and the only one indeed that many of them have ever known.

Chunar, as you are aware, is a station for European Invalid soldiers from the Company's Service. All who have not served 21 years when invalided, are sent here to complete that period in the performance of Garrison duty, if considered capable of doing so; and nearly all the married men of the Company's Army locate themselves here, when past further service. The European population consists, then, chiefly, of old men, whose lease of life, is, in nature's course, fast closing; men of fewer years, who have sustained injuries on duty, or whose constitutions have been shattered by disease or climate, and children. Amongst a society so constituted you will readily believe, that all the aid which religion can afford, is more than ordinarily needed; and that the calls for the administration of the sacred offices would be incessant, if calling were not known to be vain. The worn old man drops into his grave, without any one of those consolations or aids in which our very Holy Religion is so rich, and of which he expresses himself so desirous; and our youth, for the want of an instructor, are left as ignorant of the doctrines of their Faith, as they are careless of its observances. And yet it is not that the spirit of piety is wanting, that we are thus destitute. Since I came to Chunar, I have witnessed more manifestations of religious feeling, than I have elsewhere met with in India, which, indeed, might naturally be looked for from the constitution of society, such as I have described it to be, and I have no hesitation in saying, that I do not think there is a station in the country, where the constant residence of a Priest is more needed; or would be more highly appreciated; or where his labours would be more fruitful & salvation to men. We have a small chapel and the celebration daily of the offices of the Sacred Heart, the Scapular, and the Rosary, are generally well attended; but it cannot be expected that a Flock without a Shepherd can thrive, and we shall feel very grateful, if you, Sir, by making our wants known, will afford us a hope of having it supplied.

Your's obediently,
AN INVALID.

SWITZERLAND—STRASBOURG.

The following extracts of a letter, dated, 31st July, 1844, is in continuation of the interesting accounts of a traveller, published in the Herald of the 28th September last:—

"I despatched my last letter to you from Milan. This is being written from the top of Mount Rigi, in Switzerland, an elevation of nearly six thousand feet above the level of the sea. This panorama is one of the Lions of Lucern. — would not come, so she remained at the Lucern Hotel, whence Dr. — and I embarked in a little steamer for Riga, where the mountain of that name is situated. After a toilsome ride of three hours, Dr. —, my Swiss guide, some women and little boys performing the task of walking up, I arrived at the summit, and what a sight burst upon me,—the rich valley of Switzerland, with its picturesque towns, lakes and rivers, lay smiling beneath me, diversified by hills and hillocks, sheep and cows, pasture, meadows and forest groves. Clouds were floating beneath, above and around me; in the midst of summer I was shivering with the cold, but braved it stoutly for the sake of enjoying this piece of enchanting scenery. You distinctly see (the clouds being dispersed by a strong breeze) ten or twelve or fourteen lakes and their exact forms; the water has the most lovely greenish hue imaginable; the mountains which enclose these lakes are covered with verdure; cattle grazing in the hollows and looking like so many dots in the plain; in the distance are the higher Alps, looking blueish and barren with patches of snow at their summits. Nature is triumphant here in rich landscape beauty, which no art, no pen, no pencil can describe adequately, much less imitate.

"What a majestic aspect has Switzerland in the grandeur and sublimity of her portion of the Alps. Two days ago we ascended these eternal monuments of the Mighty power of Nature, in a carriage drawn by four hard-working horses, over a road that excited my admiration for its goodness, solidity, extent and the consummate skill by which a multitude of formidable obstacles were overcome. But in ascending the great St. Gothard, what magnificent natural treasures were displayed almost every five minutes. We followed for more than forty miles the course of the river Tecino, which waters the rich plains of Lombardy; you cannot, by the wildest effort of your imagination, picture to yourself the rich, indescribably rich, magical, sublime, lovely, bewitching scenery that charms you at every turn. The Tecino in these parts is but a mountain torrent, but what a torrent! heedless, impetuous and sudden, it perseveres with gigantic strength in its onward course; leaping from crag to crag, foaming and frothy, dashing down with a roar that stuns and deafens the traveller, who is almost bewildered with admiration; this torrent, in overcoming the mighty obstacles by which the smoothness of its progress is frustrated, seems to lash itself into a fury, and presents such rapid falls, such daring leaps over enormous blocks of granite, as excite the most intense admiration in the spectator. Fancy to yourself the almost irresistible power of this mountain torrent, which has cut its way through solid blocks of such dimensions that giants alone could have removed; fancy to yourself this turbid stream receiving, during its rapid course, lavish tributes from more than a thousand rills trickling down the mountain sides, some of these tributaries being rich, powerful cascades, which dash down with indescribable grandeur; fancy to yourself the rich Swiss valley of Tecino in which these scenes are being enacted with all the accessories of crags and precipices, snow-capped peaks, pine and fir forests; fancy to yourself the varying relative positions of the spectator and the scenery—sometimes the valley closes to a narrow compass, and the restless impetuous Tecino winding in some sequestered spot is not seen at all and can be known only by its angry roar; at other times the valley widens in a considerable degree, displaying lovely green meadows and groves of blooming orchard, trees laden with fruit. Sometimes you are nearly on a level with the bed of this restless torrent, at another time you see it dashing and foaming at the depth of a hundred feet or more, with a violence that throws the spray all around to a considerable distance. Now you see the mountain tops bare and rugged without a blade of green grass to relieve their naked, brown aspect; some time after you see the sides covered with vegetation and the tops fringed, as it were, with pine and fir trees, forming the most picturesque object in the world. I have no doubt you smile at the bombast of which I am guilty, but I assure you that the Alpine scenery of Switzerland would make the soberest fellow in the world, a perfect Bombastos Furioso, unless he be dead to all perception of natural beauty.

"In ascending Mount St. Gothard, said to be the highest inhabited point in Europe, ——— and I, assisted by our good and adventurous friend Dr. ——— walked upon a large heap of snow and left our foot-marks on its flaky surface. The air was colder, at that height, in summer (29th July), than we have it generally in January in Calcutta; this will give you some idea of what degree of cold there must be in an Alpine winter.

"Within the last fortnight, I have seen a great deal of beautiful scenery. We have been on the Lago Maggiore, the Lake of Como, and at this moment, I am writing on the banks of the Lake of Lucern. ——— and ——— will smile at these names and recall their favorite songs, the theme of which treats of those beautiful lakes. On the Lago Maggiore, we had a delightful boat trip one whole day, and enjoyed ourselves with a variety of natural and artificial sights, one of which was a small island, called Isle Borromeo, on which is a palace very large and richly furnished with a superb gallery of paintings; the gardens of this palace are small but well laid out, jutting out as it were into the lake. The lower or ground floor of the palace is a series of artificial grottos, cut out of a rock and studded with shells. The scenery all around is really charming. We had another trip of half a day on the Lake of Como, which is not so large a piece of water as the other, but is infinitely richer in natural scenery; the Alps here just begin to assume that lofty grandeur, which is so fully and strikingly developed in Switzerland, a land which nature seems to have delighted in adorning, with lakes, rivers, and torrents, cascades, and waterfalls, that absolutely bewilder you with delight and amazement.

"In crossing the Lake of Lucern, from Huellin to Lucern (done in three hours by steam) we were shown two or three spots of peculiar interest connected with the celebrated William Tell, the deliverer of Switzerland from the tyranny of its Austrian Governor. The spot where this daring hero leapt on shore from the boat which was conveying him to prison is consecrated by a little chapel, which is popularly known as William Tell's chapel: another spot is celebrated as the spot whence he shot the tyrant Gesler; a third spot is also hallowed as the meeting place where a band of devoted patriots swore to free their enslaved country or perish in the attempt. These glorious historical reminiscences render Switzerland a country of great interest abstractedly speaking; but, alas! the Cantons are now divided not only by little petty political intrigues but by the more serious and mischievous spirit of religious bigotry. On leaving Como, we passed through two Catholic Cantons, where we had the gratification to see a number of fine Churches bearing, externally as well as internally, the impressive signs of the solemn rites of the Catholic Church; when we came to Basle, alas! what a scene of spiritual desolation presented itself. The Protestant party had the ascendancy, and kept the Catholics down with a strong hand; there is but one Catholic Church in Basle and that is a small one; the Catholics, though not numerous, are yet too large for the building. I assisted at Mass on Sunday and saw more than a couple of hundred people standing in the open air, the Church within being overcrowded. Some of the wealthy Catholics had applied to the Local Government for a spot of ground to build a new and more commodious Church; the application was refused. The Catholics are not allowed to ring the bells; several large Catholic Churches are converted into public warehouses; the beautiful Cathedral (once Catholic) is now devoted to the Lutheran worship; it was with great difficulty that the Catholic priests were allowed to build a house for themselves. What think you of the Protestant doctrine of "freedom of conscience?" William Tell, the deliverer of Switzerland, was a Catholic; he freed his country from a foreign and tyrannical yoke, and how has his example been followed by his Protestant countrymen who, enjoying the civil and social liberty which his patriotism gave them, have fettered the spiritual liberty of their fellow citizens! What a mockery is Protestantism of everything that is consistent, free and generous!

7th August.—Yesterday we were in the republican Cantons of Switzerland, to-day we are walking the streets of Strasbourg, in the kingdom of France, passing, on the way, the Duchy of Baden; so much for the regularity and swiftness of steam!

"Strasbourg is a fine, lively, bustling town, where German is freely spoken, and where the celebrated Pate de Foie Gras is prepared. I went to the shop and purchased a small pot (about a pound in quantity) of this national French dish; it cost six francs. We have not tasted of it yet. There is a fine bronze statue of the famous Gen. Kleber who was a native of Strasbourg and one of Napoleon's most talented officers. He died in Egypt: I believe assassinated. In Strasbourg, we saw the famous Clock, and the working of its wonderful mechanism. Just as the clock has given the twelfth stroke of noon, a large cock, admirably represented, shakes his wings, raises his neck and crows; then comes the 1st Apostle gliding along, he stops before the image of the Saviour and bows; the Saviour then blesses him by a sign of the hand, when the figure of the Apostle glides on and vanishes; the second Apostle then appears and goes through a similar ceremony; when the sixth figure comes forward, the cock, who is perched on high, repeats his extraordinary gestures and cry, after which the sixth and the remaining five Apostles go through their allotted tasks, at the conclusion of which the watchful cock crows a third time. The regularity, precision and grace with which this skilful piece of mechanism is made to act, amaze the beholder.

"From Strasbourg we took our passage on a Steam boat down the Rhine and stopped for a couple of days in each of these towns—Manheim, Mayence, Heidelberg and Cologne. From this last place, we proceeded by Railway to Brussels, Ghent, and Ostend, three populous towns of Belgium. From Ostend we crossed over by Steamer to Dover, whence by Railway we landed, safe and sound, in London, the great metropolis of the world."

Selections.

We regret to announce the decease at Kamptee on the 20th ultimo of the Rev. J. Breen, Roman Catholic Priest at that station. This amiable and zealous clergyman died of dysentery, to which so many persons have fallen victims at Kamptee and Secunderabad during the present season. The remains of the deceased were interred in the Roman Catholic Chapel on the following evening, upon which occasion (says our Correspondent) the vast concourse of people who attended his remains to the grave, "best testify the respect in which Mr. Breen was held, and the regret that was felt for the departed." The Rev. J. McEvoy, Station Chaplain, and a great number of Officers attended the funeral of this pious and excellent Priest, who was respected and esteemed by all ranks at Kamptee.—United Service Gazette, October 15.

ON THE USE OF THE BIBLE.

THE LETTER OF FENELON TO THE BISHOP OF ARRAS.

MY LORD,—As you have signified to me your wish to know my sentiments, respecting the propriety of the laity reading the Bible, I will endeavour to state these, with all that veneration and deference, which you so justly merit.

I. It is my opinion, then, that many writers have given themselves a very needless degree of trouble to prove, what cannot be called in question,—namely, that the laity were wont to read the Bible, during the first ages of the Church. To be convinced of this, we need only to consult the works of Saint Chrysostom. Thus, he says, for example, in his preface to the Epistle to the Romans,—that “he bitterly regrets, that many of the Faithful do not understand St. Paul, as they should do; and that the ignorance of some is so great, as not even to know the number of his Epistles.” “The reason of this disorder,” he adds, “arises from the circumstance of their not assiduously reading the writings of the apostle.” He, moreover, states, that “the ignorance of the Holy Scriptures is the source, both of the contagion of heresies, and of the corruption of morals.” They,” he says, “who turn not their eyes to the rays of the Scriptures, fall necessarily into errors, and into the commission of frequent faults.” These reproaches were addressed to the laity, who attended the sermons of the Saint.

Saint Jerome, instructing Læta respecting the education of her daughter, tells her, that “soon as the child is a somewhat older, her parents should find her constantly employed in the sanctuary of the Scriptures, consulting there the prophets and the apostles, concerning her spiritual nuptials.” Let her,” he adds, “bring back to you, each day, the fruits of her regular work, which will be a collection of flowers, culled from the Scriptures.” Let her learn, first, a certain number of the Greek verses; and then instruct herself by the Latin version. Teach her,” he says, “to love the sacred books in preference to precious stones and robes of silk.” Let her learn by heart the Psalms. Let her know the Proverbs of Solomon, relating to the rules of life. Let her, from the Ecclesiast, be engaged to trample under foot the vanity of worldly things; and from the book of Job to imitate the examples of courage and resignation. From these instructive lessons, let her proceed to the Gospels; and let these be constantly in her hands. Inspire her with an ardent thirst for the Acts of the Apostles and for their Epistles. Make her learn by heart the Prophecies; the seven first Books of the Scripture; those of Kings; and the Chronicles, along with those of Esdras, and Esther. Last of all, and when the thing can be done without danger, let her read the Canticle of Canticles. This precaution is necessary, lest, reading it too early, she might not, under its carnal expressions, comprehend the mystery of the spiritual nuptials with the sacred Spouse; and the tenderness of her innocence might, thus, possibly be wounded.”

In thus laying down the above plan of education, St. Jerome does not pretend to violate the established discipline of the Church, at that period. On the contrary, he but followed the general practice, which then prevailed in the method of instructing young Christian females. Now, if the Saint thus required, that a child, so young as Læta, should not only know, but even learn by heart, so many portions of the Scriptures,—what ought we not, of course, to infer, with regard to men of mature age, and of women of tried discretion and distinguished piety? Moreover, in those times, both the Scriptures, and the Liturgies of the respective churches, were written, and used, in the vulgar languages. Thus, in the West, men, all understood the Latin, in which they possessed the ancient version of the Bible, denominated by St. Austin “the old Italic.” In like manner, they enjoyed, also, the Liturgy in the same language, which was again the language of the people.—In regard of the East, it was, likewise, here, the same thing:—The public here, all spoke Greek: they understood the version of the Septuagint, and the Greek Liturgy,—just as now we understand our modern translations. Wherefore, without entering into any critical discussions, nothing is more manifest than the following facts,—that the Christian public possessed, each in their own languages, both the Bible, and their Liturgies,—which, for their pious education, the very children were made to read;—that the holy pastors of each church were wont, in their sermons, to explain regularly, and in order, the entire books of the Scriptures;—that the sacred text was familiar to the people;—that they were continually exhorted to read the holy volume, and blamed,—if negligent,—for the omission;—in short, that the Church, and its pastors, considered the neglect of the Scriptures, both as a source of heresies, and as a cause of the relaxation of piety and morals. The evidence of all this is incontestable, because it is clearly attested by the monuments of antiquity.

II. On the other hand, my Lord, it cannot be denied, that, whilst the Church acted thus, in relation to the great body of the Faithful, she was, at the same time, peculiarly careful not to intrust the sacred volume to the hands of those, of whose faith and piety she was not, as yet, completely satisfied. Thus, in regard of the Catechumens, she employed the nicest care and prudence, to discover to them only by slow degrees the mysteries of faith; and the form and nature, of the holy sacraments. Thus, also, conducted by the same spirit, she regulated her discipline, in relation to her Neophytes; and to such young individuals, who, as yet, were deemed tender in their faith,—permitting these to read the Scriptures, only in proportion to their supposed necessities, and dispositions. The Jews had already given the example of this necessary discipline: for they never allowed the reading of the beginning of Genesis; of certain parts of Ezechiel; and of the Canticle of Canticles, before men had attained the age of maturity and discretion. We have, indeed, just seen, that St. Jerome observed the same method, or economy in regard of the young Læta, prescribing, at first, certain books; and, ere long, certain others; and, last of all, the Canticle of Canticles,—because the carnal expressions, under which the mystery of the sacred nuptials of the soul with the divine Spouse is concealed, might possibly wound the delicacy of her heart, had they been confided to her before she had made a certain degree of progress in the simplicity of faith, and in the attainment of the interior virtues. Thus, on one side, the Scriptures were given to all the Faithful. On the other, they were given to individuals, in proportion only to their respective wants; to the measure of their progress; and to the degree of their acquirements.

III. It would be a dangerous opinion, and a prejudice too nearly approaching to that of the Protestants, to imagine, that the Christian may not be solidly instructed in all the truths of religion, although he has never read the Scriptures at all. Saint Irenæus was far from entertaining such opinion when he says:—"What if the apostles had not even left us the Scriptures—should we not, in this case, have been bound to follow the order of that Tradition, which they have deposited in the hands of those, to whose care they have confided the government of the churches? There are many barbarous nations that have received the faith in Jesus Christ, and that have followed this order,—preserving, without letters or ink, the truths of salvation, written in their hearts by the Holy Ghost; observing carefully the ancient Tradition; and believing, through Jesus Christ, the Son of God, in one only God, the Creator of heaven and earth, and of all things contained therein. . . . These men, who have embraced this faith, without the help of any letters, are barbarians in relation; to our language; but in respect to doctrine, practices, and morals,—in respect to FAITH, they are thoroughly wise, and pleasing to God,—leading lives of perfect justice, chastity, and virtue. Hence, then, should any one, speaking to them in their own native language, propose to them the dogmas, invented by the heretics,—straight, they would stop their ears and fly far away,—not bearing to listen to a discourse so replete with blasphemy. Thus, being supported by the ancient Tradition of the apostles, they refuse to admit even into their simple thoughts the slightest image of those monsters of error."

From these words of this great doctor of the Church,—and who was nearly a cotemporary of the apostles,—we see that, in his time, there were among the barbarous nations, a numberless body of faithful believers, who were highly spiritual and perfect; and, as St. Paul says, "rich in all word and in all science," although, yet, they had never read the sacred books. It is not that this circumstance diminishes, in the slenderest degree, the value of the holy volumes; neither ought it, any way, to lessen the zeal of the Christian public to nourish their minds with the heavenly food,—conducted, meanwhile, by an humble dependence upon the Church. But, in short, this fact is clear,—evinced by the most positive, and satisfactory testimonies,—that Tradition alone, without the use of the Scriptures, sufficed to establish the faith, and to form the morals, of countless multitudes of the Faithful;—and this, too, in a degree the most perfect and sublime. The Church, which has given the sacred books to us,—has to them, without these holy records, communicated, by her living word, all those same doctrines, and instructions, which we derive from the sacred text. That unwritten word; which is in the mouth of the Spouse of the Son of God, supplied for the absence of the written word; and administered to the mind the same interior nourishment. Hence it was, that those pious individuals, being thus enlightened, would, as St. Irenæus remarks, have stopped their ears at the first sound of any erroneous or contagious doctrine. Strong in the simplicity of faith, and humbly docile to the voice of the Church,—they, in these happy dispositions, had the discernment to reject, and the delicacy to shun, every artifice, however subtle, of the authors of innovation. Wherefore, as the same Saint observes, it would be a very erroneous notion to suppose, that the Church cannot conduct her children to perfection, both in regard of faith and morals, without the use or reading of the Bible.

What St. Irenæus has attested respecting the Faithful in his times, St. Austin has equally stated concerning the Solitaries, in his days. "A man," says the Saint, "supported by faith, hope, and charity, does not stand in need of the Scriptures, unless it be for the sake of instructing others. It is thus that many Solitaries live in the deserts with these three virtues, without the use of any of the sacred books."—Thus we see the hermits themselves, in their deserts, sanctified by the fervour of their prayers; and, without any aid from the Scriptures, arriving at the highest state of spiritual contemplation. We read even, that one of these holy recluses went so far as to sell the sacred volume, by which he had been instructed "to sell all," in order to give himself up entirely to the spirit of evangelical poverty.

After having considered these, so frequent, examples, can we be otherwise than convinced, that the Faithful may attain perfection without reading the Scriptures,—since thus the Church, which teaches them by the spirit of her Divine Spouse, becomes to them a living Scripture; and a Scripture, distributed amongst them in a way, of all others, the best adapted, and proportioned, to their capacities, and wants? It is under the impression of these feelings, that St. Austin says to the Faithful: "Attend to the Scriptures: We are your book."—Intenti estote ad Scripturas: Codices vestri sumus. Men do indeed read the Scriptures, when they listen to the voice, and instructions, of their pastors, who explain them; and who inculcate and deliver to them those parts of the sacred volume which are adapted to their respective duties and obligations. Thus, the pastors of the Church are, in fact, the real living Scriptures. Considering these circumstances, no private individual can, with anything like reason, complain, as if he were debarred from acquiring the knowledge of the truth. For, if so, he must, in such case, not only regard the Tradition of the Church as insufficient, but he must also prefer his own interpretations of the sacred text to the dictates of her authority, presumptuously conceiving, that he understands the sense of the Divine Volume better, and with more unction, and wisdom, than she does. Wherefore, behold, what ought to be the conduct of the Faithful, whenever the Church, in her prudence, should deem it necessary to restrict their liberty of reading the Bible, in order, by an equivalent, to impart to them a series of instructions, more accommodated and measured to the nature of their present wants:—They ought, on such occasion, to humble themselves; and on the assurances of this Holy Mother, believe that they sustain no loss. They should rest contented with the simple food of milk and bread; receiving with docility of mind what the Holy Ghost, the author of the Scriptures, thus dictates and communicates to them, as the truths themselves of the Scriptures, without confiding to them the sacred text,—lest, by their ignorance, or profane curiosity, they should interpret it amiss. Curiosity, and all presumption, or precipitancy,—under whatsoever alleged pretext of the love of the Word of God, men may seek to justify these evils,—are in reality in such cases but the dictators of pride and the temptations of independence.

IV. During those happy periods, when the Scriptures were read by multitudes of the Faithful, in the manner above described, there were then a variety of causes, which prevented, or checked, the abuse of the sacred volume.

In the first place, the pastors in the different churches were wont to explain incessantly the sacred text, in order to inculcate the sense of Tradition; and to prevent the presumption of private individuals from attempting to interpret it, according to the dictates of their own fancies; or in a sense repugnant to the sober, and temperate, explanations, affixed to it by the wisdom of the Church. In the next place, it was the practice of the Faithful, whenever any, however slender difficulty occurred, respecting the meaning of an obscure text, or passage, to consult the learning and piety of their pastors. Thirdly, soon as ever any individual was suspected of any novelty in the interpretation of the sacred text, the bishops at once assembled, and explained away the difficulty. In short, in order to prevent, or to check, any dissension in the Church, it was the custom, above all in the West, to consult the Apostolic See. It was by these means, and by the simplicity of faith, the docility of the public mind, and the authority of the pastoral body, combined with their continual instructions, that the contagion of error, and the diffusion of any dangerous abuse, were effectually prevented, or suppressed. It is true, indeed, that, notwithstanding such precautions, there did sometimes, here and there, rise up a few daring innovators, perverting the sacred text, and creating very dangerous contests and disputes. For St. Peter tells us, that, in the Epistles of St. Paul, "there are some things hard to be understood, which the unlearned, and unstable, wrest,—as they do, also, the other Scriptures,—to their own destruction." Even the pious Origen seems sometimes to have carried too far his allegorical interpretations, in order, as St. Jerome expresses it, to exalt his ideas into so many divine mysteries. On the other hand, the Semi-Pelagians complained, although unjustly, that St. Austin explained the Epistle to the Romans in a new sense, and in a way unheard of in the order of Tradition. But, in short, during those ages, the spirit of freedom, and licentiousness, in the interpretation of the sacred pages, had, no where, even remotely, approached to the rashness of that criticism, which, in these days, is daily, and every where, shaking the very foundations of Christianity.

HIEROLOGUS; OR, THE CHURCH TOURISTS.

(Concluded from our last.)

The dialogue is interspersed with poetical pieces, some of them original, and some extracted from the older and less known poets—especially those in which the author thinks he can discover what he considers the Catholic tone of thought and feeling. Under this head we should have expected to meet more of Chaucer, who, however objectionable many of his tales must be admitted to be, yet has done more in his devotional poetry to illustrate the Catholic usages and feelings of England in the fourteenth century than any other writer of the language. Among the original pieces, we would particularize a hymn to St. Lucy, some very beautiful lines upon a nameless old stone in the vale of Llanelydd in Wales, with the simple words Homos Christianus erat, and a translation of St. Hildebert's hymn, Extra postam jam delatum. We must be content with the first:—

"We watched as she lingered all the day
Beneath the torturer's skill;
And we prayed that the spirit might pass away,
And the weary frame be still.
'Twas a long sharp struggle from darkness to light,
And the pain was fierce and sore;
But she, we knew, in the latest fight,
Must be more than conqueror!
"Oh, what a change had the prison wrought
Since we gazed upon her last!
How mournful the lesson her thin frame taught
Of the sufferings she had past:
Of pain and sickness—not of fear!
There was courage in her eye,
And she entered the amphitheatre
As to triumph, and not to die!
"And once, when we could not bear to see Her sufferings, and turned the head,
"This rod and this staff they comfort me,"
The virgin martyr said:
It was near the setting of the sun,
And her voice waxed faint and low:
And we knew that her race was well nigh run,
And her time drew near to go.
"We could almost deem the clouds that rolled
In the ruddy sun's decline,
To be chariots of fire and horses of gold,
On the steep of Mount Aventine,
Yea, guardian angels bent their way
From their own skies' cloudless blue,
And a triumph more glorious was thine to-day
Than ever the Cæsar knew!
"We lay thee here in the narrow cell,
Where thy friends and brethren sleep;
And we carve the palm, of thy lot to tell,
And we do not dare to weep.
Hopefully wait we God's holy time
That shall call us to share thy rest;
Till then we must dwell in an alien clime, While thou art in Abraham's breast!"

—pp. 195-6.

Perhaps the most interesting portion of the work, however, is that devoted to ancient monuments and monumental inscriptions. Some of the specimens selected are extremely striking and impressive, especially when contrasted with the tawdry though elaborate compositions of more modern times. Mr. Neale does not shrink from avowing his anxiety for a return, not alone to the olden simplicity, but to the faith which inspired it, and to which it owes its beauty and significance. He is afraid that the form "Orate pro anima," though sanctioned, nay adopted, by some of the great Divines, would hardly meet with general acceptance: but "why," he asks, "not restore Cujus anima promicietur Deus? or Cujus anima cum Deo? or Cujus anima et omnium fidelium defunctorum miseretur Deus? or, again, the prayer Jesu fili Dei miserere mei, or Sancta Trinitas, Unus Deus, miserere nobis; or, in plain English, Jesu mercy!"—(p. 230.)

Nothing could be happier than his description of a procession in a Gothic cathedral. He is speaking of what he saw in Amiens.

"I can almost fancy that I see it now, as I saw it for the first time, on much such an evening as this. The stupendous height of the vaulted roof; the rich foliage of the piers; the tall lancet arches throwing themselves upwards; the interlacings of the decorated window-tracery; the richness of the stained glass; the glow of the sun-light on the southern chapels; the knotted intricacies of the vaulting ribs; the flowers and wreaths and holy symbols, that hung self-poised over the head; the graceful shafts of the triforium; the carved angels, that with outstretched wings keep guard over the sacred building; the low, yet delicately carved choir-stalls; the gorgeous altar, faintly seen beyond them; the sublime apse, with its inimitably slim lancets, carrying the eye up higher and higher through the dark cloister-gallery, through the blaze of the crimson clerestory to the marble grandeur of the fretted roof; lights and carving and jewels, and gold, and the sunny brightness of the nave, and the solemn grayness of the choir; these all are but accessories to the scene. The huge nave-piers rise from the midst of a mighty multitude; the high-born lady; the peasant mother, with her infant; the grey-headed labourer; the gay bourgeois; the child, that knows only the sanctity of the place; the strong man and the cripple; the wise and the unlearned; the great and the small; the rich and the poor; all meet as equals. The sweet music floats along from the choir; the amen bursts from the congregation. Now the organ, at the west-end, takes up the strain, sweetly and solemnly, like the music of far off angels, and as the holy doors open, pours forth the hymn 'The banners of the King come forth.' White-robed boys strew the way with rose-leaves; there is the gleaming and the perfume of silver censers; there are the rich silver crosses and the pastoral staff; there is the sumptuous pall that covers the Host; there is an endless train of priests with copes and vestments bright as the hues of a summer sunset, gemmed with the jewels of many lands, lustrous with gold, and chased with flowers, and wreaths, and devices of pearl; but each and all bearing, though in different forms, that one symbol, the cross. Right and left the crowd part as the train passes, and as the pall is borne by, every knee is bent, every head bowed. And now the soft breathings of the organ die away; voice, and clanging, and flute take up the hymn. 'The banners of the King' move stately down the nave; and in every pause of the strain, not a sound is to be heard save the silver chime of the falling censer chains. Now they enter the north aisle: now they bear up again towards the choir: now they wind among its chapels: fainter and fainter arises the holy hymn as they recede eastward; now with faint and mellowed sweetness it steals from the distant shrine of our Lady; now it is silent, and the organ takes up the note of praise."—pp. 253-5.

But far beyond this glowing picture, all gorgeous as it is, we prize the honest and kindly testimony to the devotion of the worshippers, with which he concludes:

"Theophilus.—And does the devotion of the worshippers equal the splendour of the worship?"

"Cath.—Undoubtedly. We have lately heard, in an archidiaconal charge, the assertion, that in the Romish church, the people gaze on the official devotions of another and do nothing for themselves. I hope this is only ignorance."—p. 225.

We shall add one other extract of a different kind, but singularly beautiful both in thought and expression. It is a description of the most touching of all scenes,—a burial at sea.

"It was that of one, who, after vainly seeking for health in a more genial climate, was returning to England in the hope of lying among her own people. But we yet wanted three days of making our own land when it pleased God to call her to himself. It was a still summer evening that I committed her to the deep. The sea was calm and peaceful: the sun almost rested his broad red disc upon the waters, forming a path of glory to himself upon the face of the ocean like a road for happy spirits to a better world; the soft hills of Portugal were blue in the distance, the air was mild and balmy: it was just the scene that seemed as if the world had never known and never could know grief; and there, while the vessel was held on and off, were the mourners clustering round the gangway; there were the weather-beaten sailors with some feeling even in their iron countenances; there was the union-jack, the only mark of respect we could give; then came the solemn service, and at the sad words, 'We therefore commit her body to the deep,' the splash of the waters and the gurgling of the waves over that which was committed to their trust—not given to their possession. For who but could feel that to be Christian burial, when the waves had been stilled and trodden by our Redeemer, when the bodies of so many of his saints have been committed to them, and when one day they must of necessity give up their dead?"—pp. 232-3.

And here we must reluctantly cease. From those which we have hitherto given, an idea may be formed of the lighter portions of the Hierologus. Its more solid chapters will well repay a careful and leisurely examination. It can hardly be possible but that these studies will lead to a better appreciation of many great Catholic truths which have been the object of ignorant scorn or bigoted misrepresentation. Of their own nature, too, they are essentially progressive, and every advance is valuable, not only for itself, but for the ulterior results to which it leads. Mr. Neale "feels sure, that when once churches are built or restored so as to be equal to them of olden times, when we have gilded and frescoed roofs and walls, rood screens burning with gold, rich deeply-tinted windows and encaustic tiles, the poverty of our present vestments will become intolerable." We are equally sure that the want will not cease there, that the cravings after the true and the beautiful will not be satisfied even with this advance. Men will not long remain with these forms under their eyes, before they begin to examine seriously how far they possess, how far it is possible within the pale of the Anglican Church to possess, the realities which they represent;—how far the Anglican Church, as at present constituted, herself attempts to do it? They will begin to enquire whether this "movement," as it is called, is in reality a movement of the Church, and not merely an unauthorized proceeding of private individuals; and to speculate how it is that, while the clergyman of one parish is "decidedly Catholic in his views," a devoted advocate of chancels and east-end altars, a stickler for altar plate and candlesticks, and even an admirer of roods and rood-screens; yet his neighbouring clergyman—equally a minister of the Church, equally approved and sanctioned by the bishop—looks upon all these things as silly forms, if not dangerous novelties; and what is still more important, denounces to his people as "damnable and idolatrous" the very doctrines which these forms are meant to symbolize and embody? The question will arise, no matter how ingeniously it is mystified, how is it possible that the Church can really hold these as her own doctrines, and yet, in a matter which every other Church claiming to be called Catholic considers essential, leave to individuals, whether clergy or laity, to adopt them or not at their own pleasure; and even impose upon all a body of articles which cannot, without a process of grammatical torture which it is difficult not to call dishonest, be forced into a construction compatible with the belief of them? It will be remembered before long, when the first flush of novelty is over, that this sudden passion for antiquity is of very recent origin, and of very precarious tenure; that there are no canons to guard, no Church authority to enforce it; that it has but little stability beyond the enthusiasm or caprice of those who have forced it into popularity, and that there is no guarantee either in the constitution of the Church, or in the formularies which she imposes, against a relapse into the same feelings and the same usages which existed twenty or thirty years ago, when vestries and rural deans were content to "putty up" the holes in the rickety deal table used for the communion service (p. x), and when a pulpit or reading desk for the parson's wife, was to be seen vis-à-vis to that in which the parson himself officiated! (p. 243.) It is perfectly plain that no amount of external decoration, no degree of exactness in restoring the ancient forms, will ever afford any such security. At the time when the external appointments of the English Church—the matériel, so to speak, of Divine worship—was all but perfect;—certainly far nearer to perfection than all the resources at the command of the present generation of the lovers of antiquity could ever hope to bring it. And yet, when once the bond of unity was severed, and the allegiance to the successor of Peter discarded, how long did the splendour of ceremonial, and the imposing array of external symbols, and the solemnity of public worship, avail as a bulwark to protect the faith with which they had from immemorial ages been associated, or rather identified? For a few short years it remained as of old. But the storm came, and the flood arose; and if the weak bulwarks which the established forms presented, had the effect of checking its onward course for a moment, it was but to delay, without averting, the threatened ruin; and the fatal torrent, concentrating its strength by the interruption, gradually swelled beyond the feeble barrier, till at length, overthrowing every obstacle, it swept away all—the ancient faith and the ancient rites,—the symbols and the reality, the substance and the form,—in one common, and, to human power, irreparable ruin.

Nor need we remind Mr. Neale, that in the England of that period everything was unfavourable to the progress of the innovation. The Catholic doctrines were then the public creed of the English Church: there was nothing in the whole circle of English life,—religious, social, and political,—which did not perfectly harmonize and assort with their spirit. The very courtesies of every-day life, the forms of ordinary salutation, were Catholic in their tone. Men were habituated, from their youth upwards, to hear Catholic language, to witness Catholic usages, and, as it were, almost to breathe a Catholic atmosphere. The truths they were required to believe were constantly brought before their eyes, and kept alive in their memories by a thousand palpable and obvious forms. How completely is the picture now-a-days reversed! And if these forms, all perfect as they were, could not avail to keep England Catholic when she was and had for ages been so, how much less hope that a feeble imitation of them can now restore her Catholicity, after three centuries of rampant and unbridled Protestantism?

Alas, when England tore herself from the side of the parent Church, she madly cast away all the precious privileges of membership,—the holy faith, the sanctifying practices, the sublime and majestic ceremonial. Those of her members who would now regain them, must re-attach themselves in the bonds of obedience to the venerable Mother, under whose arm England enjoyed them in the olden time. Until this is done all the rest is unavailing. He is but a sorry leech who would close the wound while the barb still remains unextracted. And they who, while her formularies remain Protestant, and her members, and even ministers, fearlessly profess the most Protestant opinions, place their trust in stately churches, with an array of so-called Catholic appliances,—chancels, and choir-stalls, and altar-plate, and copes and crosses,—are but realizing the idea mournfully suggested by Mr. Faber, in his Foreign Churches: they have "made to themselves an illuminated transparency

—a soothing sight for quiet times—and sat before it so long and so complacently, that they venture to call it a Catholic Church.”—Dublin Review.

STATE PRISONERS

The monster sentence of the monster trial is reversed. The league-long indictment, the more interminable pleadings, the insinuation of treason under a mere accusation of Misdemeanour the plainest objections and claims of right overruled, the straining of law and the perversion of justice—all have come to nought. The convulsive efforts of a corps of fanatics to push their car of Juggernaut over the necks of a chosen band of Irish victims, has failed to immolate, although its wheels have been allowed to crush and wound them. Justice, though it limped, has still come to assert the right; and though it cannot make up to the injured that large portion of punishment, unfairly, precipitately, and iniquitously inflicted by political vengeance, it still holds out a shield for the future against the arbitrary risks and chances of a monster prosecution. With our strong and repeatedly expressed conviction of the illegality of those proceedings, our first feeling is one of exultation that by this great and memorable act justice has been vindicated, and a stain, otherwise indelible, removed from the administration of the law. An enormous wrong, solemnly protested against by a whole people, has been corrected. A prosecution, the most unfair, unscrupulous and oppressive by which in our time legal forms have been discredited, has been condemned and branded by authority, unsurpassed in legal or moral weight. This noble assertion of the true principles of English law will take its place amongst those great historical transactions which give dignity and warmth to the love of freedom in this country, and the memory of it will be a warning to the Judges and Ministers of future times. Compared with this great and lasting good, any temporary inconveniences and embarrassments which may ensue to a Cabinet are as dust in the balance.

But justice being done, we are obliged to cast a look also at the immediate results. It is hardly worth while pausing to ask what is the position of the Government, but the thought in every man's mind is, what is the position of the country? The O'Connell prosecution is at length concluded, and what has it effected? The Irish people have been filled with irritation and resentment. Their leader has been attacked, accused, unfairly tried, unfairly condemned, stigmatised as a criminal, and consigned to a prison, while the very question of his guilt was undecided. In prison and lying under the imputation of crime, he has not lost but gained in the passionate veneration of his countrymen. But now a new event occurs, which must agitate the Irish mind with new intensity, and raise the national enthusiasm to an unexampled height. It is acknowledged that the obnoxious trial was unfair, the unpopular sentence unjust; and while these lines are read, the prison gates may be thrown open for the liberation of the popular champion. He comes forth with redoubled power. He tramples upon a Government as he leaves the prison walls. The prestige of his legal infallibility is restored in the eyes of his countrymen. From the greatest struggle of his life he emerges victorious.

What use will he make of the new and tremendous power which this unhappy prosecution has bestowed upon him? This question, which now flies from mouth to mouth, is the best comment upon the policy recently pursued. After all our vigorous Government of Ireland, are we to hang on Mr. O'Connell's lips to learn the fate of that country? Is this the triumph of a Government too firm to truckle to agitation? We must confess we see little reason to hope that the reparation, necessarily tardy and imperfect, which the law now makes to Mr. O'Connell for the wrong done to him, will check the activity of the repeal movement. On the contrary, the agitation is likely to go on with increased force under the stimulus of events, which will add to the pungency of every popular exhortation. The difficulties in the way of governing Ireland will be found as formidable as ever, and to remove them some new scheme must be tried.

In the present state of Ireland, Ministers cannot stand still, conciliation or coercion they must try, on some new and great scale. They have paltered too long with the integrity of the empire. The evil was felt vividly ten days ago, and no one can say how soon or how long it may be before the cloud now disappearing darkens the horizon again. A heavy responsibility lies upon that Minister who exposes the country to a concurrence so menacing as that of foreign war with intestine dissension. Every consideration of prudence, as well as of justice, now urges us to consolidate the union with Ireland. Is the session really to close without contributing any thing to this end? That it will so close is but too probable. The commission to prorogue has been appointed for one o'clock this day, almost the very hour at which the House of Commons is to meet, as if for the purpose of preventing even the slightest expression of opinion on the seriousness of the present exigency. Ministers, we fear, know not what to do, and will do nothing more than let events take their course. They have neither the courage nor the comprehension requisite to grapple with the difficulties of Irish Government, and they are equal to nothing better than looking idly on while the connection between the two countries is exposed to the shock of a new agitation.—Chronicle, September 5.

CLAIRVAUX.

The famous monastery of Clairvaux, founded by the great St. Bernard in 1115, the scene of his superhuman austerities,—which sent forth to the world such “armies of saints,”—where the temporal spiritual princes of the earth sent ambassadors to crave the arbitration of the Saint in matters alike of secular or religious difference,—which boasted, at the time of its founder's death, of seven hundred monks, and was the parent house of eight hundred other abbeys,—is now metamorphosed into a “capacious goal” Judging by the effects of revolution in France and reformation in England, the words seem to bear a strikingly synonymous import.—Cath. Magazine.

THE CHURCH OF LA SAINTE BAUME, IN PROVENCE.

The church and convent of "La Sainte Baume," situate at about an equal distance from Marseilles and Toulon, well deserves a pilgrimage. They occupy a situation most wildly desolate, which the austere spirit of a Trappist community has fittingly selected for the scene of their penitential labours. There, in a sterile and lonesome valley, some thirty monks of that rigid and inflexible order perpetuate the penitential fame of scenes hallowed, according to traditionary and immemorial legend, by the repentant tears of St. Mary Magdalene.

The old church crowns the summit of—or, more properly speaking, is scooped out of—a perpendicular rock, itself overtopped by precipitous eminences. The road to it steeply winds through a gloomy forest, that clothes every part of the mountain but that consecrated crag. Arriving at the entrance of the cavernous place of worship, after a tedious and tiring ascent, the traveller surveys a wide and magnificent prospect of hill and dale, bounded by the snowy Alps of Gap. He then enters that ancient house of God, and finds himself in just such a temple as the primitive Christians might have hallowed for themselves out of the living rock, when compelled by the persecutions of men to seek hiding-places for the solemnization of their religious rites. But for a rude fashioned altar here and there, indicating the purposes to which the place is dedicated, the cavernous church of "La Sainte Baume" contains little adornment, nature herself lending its chief solemnity to a site which pious legends have for ages invested with a character of awful sanctity. The visitor feels a dread of disturbing the death-like stillness that reigns around by aught of profane thought or remark, and yields a ready credence to the wondrous tale of the sainted Mary's miraculous voyage hither, and subsequent years of rigorous penitence passed among these rocky wilds.

"La Sainte Baume" gives a name to a peculiar kind of deep green fir that only grows on this mountain. At Whitsuntide, pilgrims from all parts of Provence flock thither, to gather branches of it, which they preserve with religious care till the ensuing anniversary of the same festival.

The Trappist monastery stands on a sterile plain at the foot of the mountain of "La Sainte Baume." It is a low, straggling, melancholy looking building, which only men whose every thought was Heaven's would consent to inhabit on earth. As we listened to those anchorites chanting the service of God in their cold and unadorned chapel, and afterwards beheld them in perfect silence, and with downcast looks, partaking of their humble meal, literally consisting but of black bread and water, we were filled with admiration and reverence for those poor monks, who to the hope of everlasting happiness in a future world sacrifice all that would seem to render life endurable in this lower one.—Cath. Magazine

PROTESTANT PERSECUTION.

(Extract from a private letter, dated Stockholm, 23d Feb.)—In 1841, a painter, and citizen of Stockholm, Sieur Joel Oscar Nilsson, openly embraced the Catholic faith, depending on the 16th section of the Swedish constitution, which accords liberty of conscience. Conceiving himself so much the more secure of his right to renounce Lutheranism, as in the diet of the year 1809, wherein that constitution was discussed and adopted, there were certain orators desirous of maintaining the first section of the constitution of the year 1772, which absolutely prohibited the Swedes from quitting the confession of Augsburg, but, in spite of this opposition, full liberty of conscience was conceded in the 16th section of the new (that is, the existing) constitution. The Sieur Nilsson had been compelled to appear several times before the Lutheran Consistory, which employed menaces and promises to make him apostatise from the Catholic faith, but the courageous confessor constantly answered that the Swedes have liberty of conscience, that the Lutheran confession of faith, as it is written in the Confessio Fidei of the Lutheran Council of Upsal, of the year 1593, and the lesser catechism of Luther, page 16 of the Falun edition of 1840, confesses enhetlig, allmannelig kyrka, a church one, holy and universal; that he saw the Swedish Church did not extend beyond the frontiers of the Kingdom, and could not by consequence be called or considered universal at all, as is the Catholic Apostolic Church of Rome. Yesterday, Feb. 22, Nilsson was condemned by the Hofratt (Court tribunal) to the confiscation of his property, to the loss of his hereditary rights, and to banishment; according to the first chapter and second section of the Kyrkislåg (church law,) of the year 1686. The judges would not permit him the assistance of counsel for his defence. I leave to you, my dear friend, and to Mr. O'Connell, to comment on these facts. The excellent agitator will see that the Swedes also know how to pass between the laws on either side, without touching either of them, as I hope the defender of the Catholics of Ireland will always do. The Turks lately cut off an Armenian's head for having abandoned Islamism, and the Swedish Journals described the fact as an action revolting to humanity; but Protestant fanaticism so blinds them, that they cannot perceive that to confiscate a man's goods, and to banish him, is to condemn him to die of hunger, for he knows no language but Swedish, and will be unable in a foreign country to ask charity for his Catholic wife and children."

"We confess our inability to see how persons can innocently go where they know error, if not falsehoods, are preached as the truth of the Gospel, without (in ordinary circumstances) being guilty of slighting the truth, or countenancing the error. If the position is exclusive, it is the exclusiveness of truth, which knows no compromise with falsehood. In these times, men should "take care what they hear."—Banner of the Cross.

REASONS FOR RENOUNCING PROTESTANTISM.

The following extract from a letter from a recent Convert to Catholicism, to his father in Dublin, shows a few of the reasons which induced him to abjure the tenets of the Church of England, and become a member of the Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church.

"You are aware, my dear father, that from an early period of my life, I have made controversial theology my study, and have been a determined opponent to Popery. In fact my judgment was so totally warped with prejudice against the Catholic tenets, that I held them unworthy of investigation, much less of belief, and devoted my whole time and attention to the study of some of the works of able and learned controversialists of the Church of England, not for a moment supposing that anything like solid and rational argument could be advanced by Catholics in support of what I had ever been taught to believe the damnable idolatry and ridiculous superstition of the Church of Rome. I was thus led to regard seven millions of my countrymen, as the blind slaves of superstition, and the dupes of the priesthood, and as capable of perpetrating the most atrocious and cold blooded villainies for the advancement of Popery. This unfavorable impression of my countrymen was not removed until after my arrival in this country. Within the last two years, I have carefully and dispassionately, though I cannot say without prejudice, examined the arguments and evidence in favour of Catholicism, and, considering the education I had received, it was with considerable difficulty I was brought to admit the solidity and conclusiveness of anything advanced by the Catholic divines, whose works I perused. I have lately, with much care, compared these arguments with Scripture, and placed them in juxta position with such as have been considered the most powerful and conclusive against Popery, and what do you think has been the result? Why! in spite of all my incredulity, and my prejudices against the religion, and principles of Catholics, the irresistible conviction on my mind is that the Catholic Church, in communion with the See of Rome, is the Church of Christ and none other. This may appear to you strange, and, considering my deep rooted hostility to Catholicism, miraculous; it is nevertheless, I must solemnly assure you, before God, true. I have as yet merely spoken of the arguments brought forward by Catholic divines,—what will you say when I tell you that I have found some of the most talented and profoundly erudite theological writers of the Protestant Church bearing testimony in favor of the claims of the Catholic Church in communion with the See of Rome to be considered the Church of Christ! viz. Hammond, Whittaker, Jeremy Taylor, Cave, Montague, and other able writers. See Hammond, on the Apostasy; Taylors' view of the Catholic doctrine of Transubstantiation; Cave on the miracles of the Catholic Church; after this, I could no longer remain a Protestant, without knowingly and wilfully setting at nought the imperious dictates of conscience, and the voice and authority of the Catholic Church of Christ. You are aware how conversant I am with the Scriptures, and how ably I have defended the Calvinistic tenets against my brother, a Clergyman of the Church of England, who had studied theology under an Arminian professor of divinity, Dr. Elvington, and will you believe, that, notwithstanding my intimate acquaintance with the Scriptures, I have never had that assurance of the truth of the doctrines, viz. the Trinity, Incarnation, Original sin, &c. &c. laid down in the Bible, and generally held by all denominations of Christians, than I have of the truth of any fact, recorded in profane history, for instance the battle of Actium. You will certainly be astounded at so awful a declaration coming from one so conversant with, not only Scripture, but the writings of ~~leafed~~ Protestant divines; it is however not the less true. I had not that assurance, because I could not believe, (as a Protestant) the Scriptures to be the Word of God, that is, I could not receive them on Protestant principles. I have been repeatedly told that the Scriptures bear testimony to their own inspiration; I have looked for this testimony, but I cannot say that I have discovered it. I have found many apparent contradictions in the Gospels, and have considered St. Paul and St. James at variance on the doctrine of justification. I have read circumstances stated in the books of Genesis, Deuteronomy, Joshua, which, according to my poor judgment, could never have been written by Moses, and Joshua, and in fact I thought there was good reason for believing that those books were neither genuine nor authentic, much less the word of God. As a Protestant I was allowed the exercise of the right of private judgment and reason, and my judgment and reason led me to doubt the authenticity and inspired character of a book which seemed so full of contradictions, both doctrinal and historical, and so totally at variance with common sense and experience. In order to clear up those doubts, I consulted the ablest Protestant expositors, and perused works written by erudite Church-of-England Divines, viz. Leland, Watson, and others, in vindication of the truths of Christianity, but, so far from solving those difficulties which I complained of encountering in the Scriptures, they generally left me more sceptical than before. I asked some Protestants upon what authority they received the Scriptures, and they could give me no satisfactory answer, others said that they received them, from the Catholic Church and believed them, on the authority of that Church. I asked them then what assurance had they that they had received the genuine Scriptures from what they called an idolatrous and lying Church, or that that lying Church had not been guilty of mutilation or interpolation. I told them that the book of Revelations, the 2nd Epistle of John and the 2nd Epistle of Peter, the Epistles of James and Jude, and the Epistle to the Hebrews were not received into the Church as canonical, until the year 397 after Christ, at the Council of Carthage, and that there was no canon of the Scriptures until the first session of the Council of Nice, assembled by order of Constantine the Great, in the year 325, after Christ, when, according to Mosheim and other Protestant Church Historians, the Catholic Church had begun to be corrupt. I further told them that Martin Luther threw the Epistle of St. James, and the Revelations, overboard, and that the authenticity and inspiration of the latter book were doubted of, by Irenæus, Dionysius, and Eusebius, three of the most learned Fathers of the Church, and not received as inspired Scripture, until declared to be canonical in the latter part of the fourth century, when the Church, according to Protestant Historians, was sunk in abominable superstition and idolatry. I told them that the Council which declared the books above named to be canonical, also declared the canonicity of the books of Macabees and of Tobias, but that these latter books were rejected by the Protestant Church. I then asked them to explain the inconsistency, but they could not. Oh! what an inconsistent Church must this be! I involuntarily exclaimed: they receive some books of Scripture, upon the authority of a fallible Council, of a fallible and idolatrous Church (the great apostasy foretold) as the inspired word of God, and for no reason that I can see, reject other books of Scripture, declared canonical by the very same Council. Finding my own Protestant Church to have no better grounds on which to rest her faith in the inspired character of the Bible, than the authority of an apostate Church, I felt myself called upon to exercise my glorious privilege, the right of private judgment, and I, consistently with common sense and reason, pitched the whole of the Bible overboard and became an avowed sceptic. In this state of scepticism I continued until I examined the arguments and evidence adduced by Catholic divines in favor of Christianity, and compared the Catholic doctrines of the present day with those of the primitive fathers, when struck with the harmony, beauty, consistency and unchanging character of the Catholic religion all over the world, I naturally and at once concluded, that if the Almighty ever did establish any system of religion on earth, that system must be the Holy Roman Catholic. Up to this moment I had doubted the divine character of the Jewish dispensation, but no sooner was I brought to see the beautiful features of Christianity, as exemplified in the Catholic Church, then I immediately resolved to submit my judgment to the teaching of that Church, and can now, thank God, say with St. Augustine, that I would not believe in the four Gospels, but on the authority of the Catholic Church, and this belief is not the belief of Protestants, having no firmer basis to rest upon, than the authority of what they call a lying and Idolatrous Church, but it is the belief of one who is convinced in his heart and soul that the Holy Roman Catholic Church is the Church of Christ, against which the gates of hell cannot prevail; that it has never erred, because Christ has promised to be with it until the consummation of the world, and that those who say, it has apostatized, must believe the promises of Christ to have failed. These are a few of the reasons which have induced me to become a convert to Catholicism. I could mention a thousand others, of as solid a nature, if I could find space and time. I have abjured the errors of Protestantism, and been admitted, by conditional baptism, into the Catholic Church. I solemnly assure you, before God, that it is solely from honest and unbiassed conviction I have become a Catholic, and from no selfish or unworthy motives whatever; the Catholic Religion is at a discount in this country, being that of the poor and uneducated, so you see I gain nothing in a temporal point of view, but much in a spiritual and an eternal. My dearest mother, who is herself pious and charitable, although she may be grieved to hear of my conversion to Popery, will, I am confident, make every allowance for one, who has only acted in obedience to the imperious dictates of conscience, and who cannot, without incurring eternal damnation, resist the conviction on his mind, that the Holy Catholic Church in communion with the See of Rome, is and ever has been the Church of Christ.

THE REV. MR. BOULOGNE.

The following farewell letter to the Rev. Father P. Boulogne, of Chandernagore, addressed to him by the Catholic Soldiers of the Right Wing, H. M.'s 10th Regiment of Foot, on the occasion of their removal from Chinsurah to the North Western Province has been sent to us by a Non-commissioned Officer, and we publish it with much pleasure:—

“REV. SIR,—With feelings of sincere regret, we, your children in Christ, beg to lay before you the testimonials of our sorrow, in having to part with a Clergyman, whom no opportunity has escaped of ministering to our spiritual wants, in every way that lay in your power, since coming under your fatherly care; not only were the healthy and strong the objects of your care and solicitude, but the sick and infirm were attended to with all that care and promptitude, ever conspicuous in the true Minister of Christ. Thus evincing to the world (but more particularly to us) the zeal you have in planting the seeds of virtue, and in rooting out the tares anywhere they may be seen in the vineyard, in which you are placed a watchman and guardian. •

“Dear Father, allow us to say, that it is with the deepest sense of feeling, we are about to depart from under your immediate charge, and proceed to a distant station, but although we are to be separated in body, in mind we shall not; for wherever it may please our authorities to send us, you shall be present in our mind and have a place in our hearts, and when we are addressing the Lord in prayer, distance shall not preclude you being present, that we, your children, may supplicate the Almighty for every blessing on the Father that has so unrequittingly attended to our spiritual and moral edification, during our sojourn in Chinsurah.

“Rev. Sir, it is useless to recapitulate the many sick calls you have had to our hospital, at all hours of the night, and that in the most inclement season of the year; however, you cheerfully attended the bed of death, and consoled the dying soldier on his departure hence. Thus counting as nothing the many exposures your own delicate constitution underwent in the cause of your fellow-man. And for what was all this toil and labour? We can answer the question, and with confidence affirm, it was for no earthly consideration, that your humane and charitable heart was biased, but solely for God's honour, and the pure intention of reclaiming and bringing back, not only the careless and profligate to a sense of their duty to God and man, but also to incite the lukewarm and indifferent to a greater diligence and fidelity in the service of our bountiful Creator.

“Rev. Sir, we, the Catholic Soldiers of the Right Wing H. M.'s 10th Regt. do humbly but fervently pray, that you may be blessed with every blessing, conducive to your temporal and eternal welfare, for the many kind offices done to this portion of H. M.'s subjects on every occasion, and when we are distant from you, we may hope to reap those fruits you were ever most assiduous in planting in the breast of every one amongst us, that has sought your aid, or has had any thought for himself, on the all-important business of Eternity.

“Dear Sir, in offering this our humble tribute of thanks to you, we humbly beg to associate the name of the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, our beloved and venerable Archbishop, who in person has done many kind and pious offices towards us, whom may God bless with his choicest blessings, as well as all the clergy under his direction, that they may all be enabled, through the help of God, to prosecute their pious missionary labours with success in the cause of benighted man, and may they be the means of adding those also to the fold, who have gone astray for lucre sake and have become a stumbling block to many, is our humble but fervent prayer to God.

"Rev. Sir, in conclusion we wish to say, that we had it in contemplation, to present you with some lasting token of our regard, but we were dissuaded from our purpose on a mature consideration, knowing that you would not keep anything for your own use that we might present you with, therefore, dear sir, we beg to present you with thirty-nine Rupees for the Catholic Orphanage, knowing that you will receive it for the use of the fatherless orphans in preference to any token we might present for your own use. And Rev. Sir, allow us to add that you are as dearly beloved by us, as if you were born in the centre of our revered Isle, for no other thought could have a resting place in the breast of any true Irishman, but that of respect and gratitude for a French Catholic Clergyman. Let us for a moment take a retrospective view of history, and we shall find that our glorious Apostle St. Patrick, was a Frenchman, and preached the gospel to our benighted ancestors in the fourth century. This is enough to make us associate the name of France with every generous feeling of our heart. Therefore, dear Sir, we trust that you will remember us to the Lord, when lifting up your hands to Him at the Altar, that He may have mercy on us. We, kind Father, reluctantly bid you farewell, and if it be not our lot to meet again on earth, we hope to meet in Heaven, where, dear Father in Christ, we hope to meet you, that in unison we may praise God and his mercies to us for all Eternity."

THE PROGRESS OF POPEERY.

For good or for evil, we are living in times when Popery is presenting a more formidable aspect in this country than has been the case for the last century and a half. Politically and spiritually it is presenting this aspect. Turn where we will, the signs are apparent; we meet with them in small matters and in great; in the observance of mere forms and in the assertion of fundamental principles. Gradually and seductively, in sermons, in pamphlets, in tracts, in the lives of hermits and of saints, we are being familiarised with Papistical observances and encroachments.

There may be those who see no danger in all this, believing, with Sir Robert Peel, that the time is past when the Church of England stands in need of legislative protection; that "she must now defend herself with other arms." We think differently; and so, we are persuaded, do the great bulk of our Protestant fellow countrymen. Let it not be supposed that we would now act in the spirit of those penal laws which have been repealed by Lord Beaumont's Bill. The particular form of danger which those laws were intended to provide against has passed away, we admit; but the danger itself has not passed away. It has only changed its character.

It is impossible to look at what is daily taking place in the Church, and out of it, the leanings to Popery in matters of form, and of the encroachments of Popery in matters of substance, and deny that the period is approaching when there will arise a determined struggle for ascendancy between the two religions. This struggle threatens to be precipitated by the temporal policy of our rulers. We are governed by men who show less anxiety to defend the Church, than to conciliate her enemies. On all occasions they are eager to concede whatever is demanded, and they think, or profess to think, that concessions will strengthen our own position.

Is there a question about maintaining the usages, the privileges, the rites, of the Established Church? These men call it bigotry. Is there a question about securing or restoring to the Roman Catholics their usages, privileges, or rites? The same phrase is employed. It is bigotry to resist such demands. We must not be so illiberal as to keep our own; neither must we be so illiberal as to withhold their own from others. We do not comprehend either such bigotry or such illiberality.

Why, it is asked, should we wish to retain on the statute book obsolete and inoperative laws—laws which are never appealed to, and which, if they were, would be rendered a dead letter by special legislation indemnifying their intended victims from their penal enactments? May we ask in turn why, if these laws be so much waste paper, the Roman Catholics are so anxious for their repeal? Having slumbered for so many years, why is this particular period selected for annihilating them. If they be useless as a protection, are they not equally harmless as a penalty? Surely they might have been allowed to remain in the desuetude into which they had fallen without this ostentation, and in some degree triumphant, removal of them from our legislative code.

Be it remembered, too, that while we are showering upon the Roman Catholics these abundant proofs of our liberality and toleration, they are requiring us with renewed acts of persecution—not of actual persecution, simply because as yet they lack the power—but in spirit, as fierce and unrelenting as the darkest ages of papal usurpation. Which of their decrees against heretics—which of the intolerant statutes of their pretended infallible Church, have they relaxed or repealed? On the contrary, while we are levelling, one by one, all the defences, which our forefathers erected, they are tenaciously insisting upon the preservation of all their weapons of attack. Ask them to reciprocate this liberality, and learn wisdom from their answer.

In the debate upon the Charitable Donations' Bill (a Bill which the Irish Roman Catholic Members received with ill-suppressed exultation, unwilling to betray the full extent of their delight,) Lord Eliot, acknowledged that the law of mortmain was to be relaxed, in order "to place the Catholics on a better footing than any other of Her Majesty's subjects." And what was the tone of Sir James Graham when he found that Mr. Sheil and others were not content with having five Roman Catholics and five Protestants to constitute the Board, subject to the contingency that by the appointment of the Judge of the Prerogative Court, the established religion might have a preponderating influence? How meekly he expressed his opinion that "the Protestant establishment ought to have security that one member of the Board should be of the established religion as five of them must be Roman Catholics, and all the remainder of the thirteen might be Dissenters."

One member—only one—ought to be of the established religion! A less favour could not be solicited at the hands of the Roman Catholics; and we suppose we must congratulate ourselves that it was accorded. Such however, is the spirit in which a Minister, who is himself of the established religion, stipulates for its interests.

In the same spirit he consented to recognise the status of the Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops in Ireland, because Mr. M. O'Ferrall and Mr. M. J. O'Connell objected to their being described as persons of a "higher rank or order." Mark, again, the humility with which he tendered this concession to the Papists:—

"Some comments had been made the other night as to the omissions in this Bill of the titles "Archbishop" and "Bishop," with reference to the Roman Catholic Clergy. He believed, and he still thought, that the words, "persons in Holy Orders in the said Church, of any higher rank in order than Priests," did include, in a manner most unobjectionable, the higher dignitaries, Archbishops and Bishops. If, however, any feeling of dissatisfaction was entertained on this subject by some Hon. Gentlemen opposite, he was bound to say that, looking back to the statutes of this country from an early period, there had been a recognition of the Archbishops of the Church of Rome—(Hear, hear, from the Opposition benches)—and the Church of England, with reference to many of her most solemn rites, had recognised the authority of the Archbishops and Bishops of that Church. He had demurred, and he still demurred, to the Archbishops and Bishops of the Church of Rome claiming titles as annexed to certain localities and districts in Ireland; but hoping to conciliate the feelings of those who were deeply interested in this measure, and having no other desire than, as far as was consistent with the maintenance of their principles, to tender that which might be acceptable to their Roman Catholic fellow-subjects—the Government were anxious to make such tender in the form and in the terms which might be most satisfactory. He would, therefore, propose the omission of these words in clause 13, line 5, "In trust for any Priest in holy orders of the Church of Rome, or for building a residence for his use, so long as he shall have the pastoral superintendence of any district, or of any congregation of persons professing the Roman Catholic religion, or in trust for any person of the said Church of any higher rank or order;" and he would propose to insert, in their stead, the words, "or for any Archbishop or Bishop, or other person in holy orders of the Church of Rome, officiating in any district, or having pastoral superintendence of any congregation of persons professing the Roman Catholic religion; and for those who shall, from time to time, so officiate, or succeed to the said pastoral superintendence; or for building residences for such persons." (Hear, hear.) The Government had gone the utmost length in their power, consistently with the principles they must maintain, in order to meet the wishes of their Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, and having made these concessions he must add that it would be their duty to resist any further alterations."

"And having made these concessions he must add that it would be their duty to resist any further alterations"—yes—just as all the alterations that have been made were resisted till Romanism grew turbulent, and, then, Ministerial Churchmen grew submissive. Oh, the incredible absurdity of supposing that the way to preserve the hundredth favour is by granting the ninety-nine! Look at the whole series of concessions which have been made to Popery during the last thirty years—you will find that each and every one of them were yielded upon conditions—framed in utter folly—the folly of believing that each was to be the last; and that contentment would spring from obtaining a part only of a desired whole.

"This," said Mr. M. J. O'Connell, "is the first Bill which recognises the Roman Church in Ireland." It was a thing for him to boast of, we grant. It was a "great fact." It was a boon from the same hands which gave to Popery its political triumph in 1829. It was more. It was the natural consequence of that fatal mistake.

Well, we have now got so far as to recognise, by law, the ~~Archbishops~~ and Bishops of the Church of Rome, merely stopping short of recognising them as Archbishops of any province, or Bishops of any Bishopric. If Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham would consult Paul Sargi's History of the Council of Trent (Lib. VIII. p. 416, An. 1463), they find there something which might shake their faith in the lawfulness of Titular Bishops, which, says the Rev. F. A. Glover, in his admirable tract, "Figmentum Papale," (a store house of learning, argument, and research upon the subject of Papal sham Bishop's) is "a most audacious imposture."

"As (observes Mr. Glover, p. 39) the incapability of the first sort to administer office in the Church is determined by those Canons, which limit the power of a patriarch to ordain in places subject to him, so is the incapability of this sort in like manner determined by those Canons which preclude the possibility of their being two Bishops, speaking different things and in opposition to each other, in the same See. Of this species are the pretending Bishops in Ireland. The first is a shabby pretence, a hiding of responsibility and office under a mean subterfuge; this is a daring one—men daring, in defiance of every sanction of apostolical precept, Canon law, the reason of things, and lastly of statute law, to style themselves Bishop of Sees in Ireland, in manifest and avowed opposition to, and derision of the powers of the apostolical, canonical, and legal Bishops of Ireland; whose office and dignities are, be it observed, legal, inasmuch as the State has had the grace to recognise and defend them by the infliction of a heavy fine on all who dare to impugn their title and style, as Bishops of the Church, by assuming the same."—(See Catholic Relief Bill, A.D. 1829, sec. xxiv.)

We think the following paragraph, which appears in the Times of Thursday, may very properly find a place here, as among the most recent occurrences indicative of the assertion with which we set out as to the present aspect of Popery in this country:—

in England since the Reformation has been recently erected in this town, and will be 'opened' on Wednesday the 28th inst. A large number of the Roman Catholic gentry, including the Earl of Shrewsbury (who has been a principal contributor,) Lord Arundel, Lord Camoys, Lord Dormer, Lord Newburgh, Viscount Southwell, the Hon. C. Cifford, the Hon. T. Stoner, Sir P. Mostyn, Sir E. Vavasour, &c., are expected to be present and the solemn pontifical mass will be presided over by Dr Wiseman. The architect is Mr. Pugin."—John Bull, Aug. 17.

CONSECRATION OF A ROMISH MONASTERY AT MOUNT ST BERNARD, LEICESTERSHIRE.

The first English Monastery of Cistercians was founded in the county of Surrey, in the year 1129, and the order so rapidly extended itself throughout the country, that in the reign of Edward the First (A. D. 1300) there were no less than 62 houses of this order in England. At the dissolution of Monastic Institutions by Henry the Eighth, such of the Cistercians as remained faithful to their vows sought refuge in continental states, where these devotees of the Romish faith were allowed to practise their austerities in security, and Monasteries were founded for the reception of the refugees.

A temporary Chapel and buildings were erected eight or nine years ago, during which period the monks have laboured with unceasing toil to bring their land into cultivation, and notwithstanding its exposed situation and great natural difficulties, they have succeeded in a great degree in covering the barren waste with productive corn fields and flourishing plantations. The building of the Monastery, which from various causes has occupied so long a period of time, is now completed, and consists of cloister, chapter-house, refectory, dormitory, calfactory, guest-house, prior's lodgings, lavatory, kitchen, offices, &c. The whole of the buildings are erected in the greatest severity of the lancet style, with massive walls and buttresses, long and narrow windows, high gables and roof, with deeply arched doorways. Solemnity and simplicity are the characteristics of the Monastery, and every portion of the architecture and fittings corresponds with the austerity of the order for whom it has been raised. The space enclosed by the cloisters is appointed for the cemetery; a stone cross, similar to those which were formerly erected in every Churchyard, is set up in the centre, and the memorials of the departed brethren will be inserted on plain wooden crosses at the head of the graves. The view from this enclosure is particularly striking. From the nature of the material used (a sort of rubble granite,) and the massiveness of the architecture, the building already possesses the appearance of antiquity, and this being combined with the stillness of the place and the presence of the religieux, clad in the venerable habits of the order, the mind is most forcibly carried back to the days of the cowl and crossier. The country immediately surrounding the Monastery is exceedingly wild and romantic—more indeed resembling Sicilian than English scenery; being situate amid the sterile rocks and stern grandeur of Charnwood. Irregular masses of granite, of most picturesque outline, surround the land cultivated by the monks; and as the situation is exceedingly elevated, the extensive prospects which open out beyond these, from different points of view, are of the most rich and varied description. The Monastery is sheltered on the north side by a huge rock, on the summit of which it is intended to erect a Calvary, which will be visible from an immense extent of the surrounding country. Only a sufficient portion of the conventual Church (viz, the nave,) to enable the monks to celebrate "the Divine office" with the necessary solemnities, is at present finished.

The consecration of the Abbey and Church above described took place last Tuesday, August 20, being St. Bernard's Day, in honour of which Saint the erection is dedicated. This being the first consecration of an Abbey Church in England since the Reformation, the attendance of Romish Bishops, Priests, Nobles, and Gentry, holding the Romish Faith, was exceedingly numerous.

The services commenced with a grand procession of Monks and Ecclesiastics, attended by the visitors, and an immense concourse of spectators from all parts. The solemn train left the old temporary monastic buildings at ten o'clock, chanting appropriate psalms, and on reaching the Abbey the usual ceremonies were performed; the office of consecration being performed by the Right Rev. Dr. Walsh, Bi-hop of Cambrayopolis; high mass by the Right Rev. Dr. Wiseman, Bishop of Melipotamus, assisted by the Right Rev. Dr. Morris, Bishop of Troy.

A sermon was afterwards preached by Dr. Wiseman, and the day being spent in religious exercises, vespers were sung, and the proceedings were closed by a sermon from Dr. Morris. —John Bull.

An Excuse for Licentiousness.—The Rev. Mr Johnson, formerly editor of the Evangelist in this city, and pastor of a Presbyterian Church in New Jersey, convicted on his own confession, by a council of his brethren of practices rather unbecoming a clergyman, has written a penitential letter, in which he ascribes his downfall in part to the debasing influence of the light literature of the age. If a beardless boy, just cut loose from his mother's apron strings, had held up one of Paul de Kock's novels, or one of Sue's or Bulwer's, and snivelled out that the book tempted him to the commission of a sin, we might be induced to pity and pardon; but for a minister of the gospel, a man set apart and consecrated as a teacher of his fellow men—a light in the world, shining out amidst deep moral darkness to say that his heels were ripped up by the novelist, is too provoking. We dare say that this Mr. Johnson has written and preached against light literature. If we could rake together his old sermons, we would find eloquent warnings against the seductions of the novelist, and yet the man who preached did not practice; he pit that he pointed out as dangerous and to be avoided, he fell into himself. By his own admission, Mr. Johnson has been a very great hypocrite; we may be uncharitable, but we are more than half inclined to believe he is now. As for the blast against light literature, it's all gammon. There are unwholesome issues from the press, but we do not believe that Bulwer, Sue, de Kock, and a host of other writers we could name, ever made a man a libertine against his own inclinations. The devil is in the man, and not in the book. —New York Herald.

THE ABBEY OF FONTEVRAULT.

This ancient monastic foundation has likewise been converted into a prison. Here, during a lapse of nine centuries, one hundred and fifty nuns and seventy monks submitted to the rule of an abbess, who was wisely a lady of the best distinction. The church is as interesting in an historical, as it is in an antiquarian point of view. Within its walls were interred the remains of two British sovereigns, and two queens. Their graves were ransacked during the French revolution, and the royal dust was scattered to the winds. Their monuments, mutilated indeed, but still highly curious and valuable, as authentic extant likenesses of the personages whom they represent, consist of four recumbent statues of Henry II: Richard, Cœur de Lion; Eleanor of Guienne, the queen of Henry II.; and Isabella of Angoulême, the queen of King John.

It was to this once celebrated and opulent monastery that the body of King Henry II. of England was brought from the neighbouring castle of Chinnon, and deposited in the sanctuary previously to interment, when, according to tradition upon Richard, his undutiful son, approaching his father's corpse, the dead body "shuddered convulsively and sweated drops of blood." —Ibid.

CHRISTIANITY.—Christianity, like a child, goes wandering over the world. Fearless in its innocence, it is not abashed before princes, nor confounded by the wisdom of synods. Before it the blood stained warrior sheaths his sword, and plucks the laurel from his brow; the midnight murderer turns from his purpose, and like the heart-smitten disciple goes out and weeps bitterly. It brings liberty to the captive, joy to the murderer, freedom to the slave, repentance and forgiveness to the sinner, hope to the faint-hearted and assurance to the dying. It enters the hut of the poor man, sits down with them and their children; it makes them contented in the midst of privations, and leaves behind an everlasting blessing. It walks through great cities amid all their pomp and splendour, their imaginable pride, and their unutterable misery, a purifying, ennobling, correcting, and redeeming angel. It is like the beautiful companion of childhood, and the comfortable associate of age. It ennobles the noble; gives wisdom to the wise; and new grace to the lovely. The patriot, the priest, the poet, and the eloquent man, derive their sublime power from its influence. —Mary Howitt.

PROPOSED FEVER HOSPITAL, IN CONNECTION WITH THE MEDICAL COLLEGE.

BABOO MUTTYLOLL SEAL having munificently presented a piece of ground in the immediate vicinity of the Medical College, for the purpose of aiding to form the site of a Fever Hospital, and the Fever Hospital Committee having in consequence promised to transfer their funds to the Council of Education to carry out the original objects for which they were collected—it is deemed advisable to make a fresh appeal to the public, upon so important a subject, to procure additional aid towards the accomplishment of an object of so much benefit and importance to the suffering poor of this great city. The Professors attached to the Medical College, have volunteered to perform gratuitously the duty of affording aid to the sick of the proposed Hospital, which will become a part of the regular duties of those officers, and of their successors in the College. The Government has likewise promised to maintain the requisite establishment, and afford all the medicine, diet, &c., that will be necessary. Under these circumstances it only remains to procure sufficient funds to provide a Native General Hospital, worthy of the city, and commensurate with its wants; when a design which has been contemplated for some time past, by some of the most enlightened philanthropists in India, will be carried into effect without further delay. As the public may not, however, at present be perfectly aware of the frightful ravages of Fever and similar diseases among the native population of Calcutta and its neighbourhood, and the urgent necessity for the establishment of an Asylum to receive the sufferers, the following passages from the able report of the Fever Hospital Committee are republished for general information, embodying the observations and experience of some of the most able and eminent members of the Medical Service in India. The extracts are selected from the Report, without professing to enter minutely into the topics discussed in that laborious work, with its numerous valuable appendices:—

“On the 9th of April, 1835, James Ranald Martin, Esquire, Surgeon to the Native Hospital, addressed a Letter to the Governors of that Institution pointing out the urgent necessity for establishing a Fever Hospital in a central part of the Native Town of Calcutta, from the constant, universal and frightful prevalence of Fever among the Native Inhabitants, its generally fatal consequences, and the acceleration of the fate of those attacked by it through the unskilful and mistaken remedies resorted to by the Native Doctors, to whose aid alone the poorer classes of Natives with few exceptions could have recourse; the relief afforded by the Native Hospital being intended by its constitution to be directed to Surgical cases.”

“The Governors came unanimously to the following Resolutions:—

- 1st. “That, in the opinion of the Governors the proposal to establish a Fever Hospital in a central part of the Native Town of Calcutta, is one of undoubted expediency.”
- 2d. “That the object is consistent in every res-which is to give Medical advice and assistance to the utmost possible extent.”

- 3d. “That our present funds, with reference to the disbursements on account of existing establishments, do not give us the necessary available means to purchase ground and to build the projected Hospital.”
- 4th. “That, under such circumstances, it is highly necessary to solicit the contributions of all classes of the Community.
- 5th. “That statement explanatory of the object now contemplated be drawn up, published in the English and Native Papers, and be circulated among the Community, Native and European, in the City of Calcutta, and throughout the Towns and Stations in the Interior.”
- 6th. “That the following gentlemen be appointed as a Sub-Committee to give effect to the above Resolutions, and to report after the result of this appeal to the Public shall have been ascertained, to the body of Governors for such further consideration as may then appear necessary”:—
“Sir Edward Ryan, Lord Bishop of Calcutta, Sir J. P. Grant, C. W. Smith, Esq. Chairman, Baboo Ramcomul Sen, Baboo Rajchunder Doss, Baboo Radhakant Deb, S. Nicolson, Esq., J. R. Martin, Esq. Dr. A. R. Jackson.”
- 7th. “That the Governors of the Native Hospital, in laying the foregoing Resolutions before the Honorable the Governor General in Council deem it right to submit for his consideration a Paper prepared by Mr. Surgeon Martin on the state of Calcutta and its Suburbs.”
- “The Governors are, of course fully sensible that the prevention of disease is even more important than its cure; and the recommendations contained in this Paper appear to them of the highest importance, and have the sanction of all the experienced Medical gentlemen of their body; but the giving effect to any of these suggestions is of course quite beyond the objects and means of this Institution; and they deem it out of their province to do more than humbly submit them for the consideration of Government.”
- 8th. “That the Resolutions of this day be communicated to Government.”

“Moodsoodun Goopto Koberuttan,* who had practised medicine in Calcutta for twelve years, among the Native population, and was educated in the Sanscrit and English College for six years, and was afterwards Professor of Sanscrit Medicine there, having been assistant to Dr. Tyler and Dr. Grant for the last two years, during which he attended their Lectures upon Anatomy and the Theory and Practice of Medicine and Surgery, stated, that his practice had been among the respectable, the middle, and the poorer classes of Natives, most among the middle classes,—that he had seen a great deal of the diseases of the lower classes—that he thought he could give the Committee a pretty accurate and full account of the disease prevalent among the Natives in Calcutta—that fevers are the most prevalent diseases; bilious, remittent, and intermittent—that enlargement of the spleen is the general termination of the two last descriptions of fever—that diarrhoea, dysentery, dyspepsia, rheumatism, and venereal disease are the most prevalent diseases in the town, among the Native population—that there are very few inflammatory diseases—that the fevers, except the intermittent, are dangerous to life, and certain to be fatal if not attended to medically—that the intermittent fever, unless it produces diarrhoea, does not produce an enlargement of the spleen; but if it is attended with diarrhoea, it almost always produces an enlargement of the spleen—that the diarrhoea following intermittent fever, is generally fatal, if not medically attended to—that the enlargement of the spleen is not generally fatal of itself; but if not cured produces dyspepsia, cedematous swellings of the legs, and hands, and loins, and anasarca, which are fatal—that dysentery is always dangerous, and if not medically attended to in time always fatal—that nearly two-thirds of the Native population in the Town have dyspepsia—that it is not of itself fatal, but produces debility, which predisposes to other diseases diarrhoea, dysentery, and piles—that rheumatism is very frequent—that it often arrives at a height among the labouring classes to prevent their obtaining their bread—that the children of the Hindoo inhabitants of Bengal are generally weakly, and that they are subject to several diseases; whooping-cough, which he considers in this country not an interfectious disease, dyspepsia, diarrhoea, dysentery, and all the fevers before mentioned—that he does not see in the Town of Calcutta, any children that are in perfect health.”

“Mr. J. R. Martin, Surgeon to the Native Hospital, said that he had perused the evidence of Modonsoodun, the last witness—that he concurred in his opinion as to the nature and extent of the disease—that he believed, however, he had underrated the prevalence of fever, and its sequelae, spleen and diarrhoea, which carry off more Natives than any other diseases—that the dyspeptic complaints of which he spoke he, (Mr. Martin,) knew to be very general.”

“In conjunction with the great objects treated of in the preceding part of this Report, the attainment of which forms the first thing necessary to the removal, or alleviation, of the present lamentable state of disease among the Native population, and the general insalubrity of the City, your Committee has, in pursuance of the objects of its appointment, directed its attention to other concomitant causes of disease, and obstacles to convenience, improvement, and prosperity, which now abound in it. To these they will presently call your Honor's attention.

“But previously to so doing, it appears to your Committee that in a City, in which, from its locality, and the absence of the necessary precautions to remedy the defects of it, disease is so prevalent that nearly two-thirds of the Native population are said to be afflicted with one of its varieties alone—where out of a fixed population estimated at under 200,000, or a floating population of 300,000, it is said, that within four months of the year 18,000 persons are attacked by fever, diarrhoea, dysentery, and cholera—and it is affirmed that there are not within it any Native children in perfect health—it is their duty to enter upon the consideration of that, which formed the first of the original objects of their constitution—the Medical treatment and care bestowed upon the Native population, not until now, they lament to say, the objects of the attention of the English Government in Calcutta.

“The Governors of the Native Hospital state, in their address to the Public, that “thousands of the poorer Natives in and about Calcutta are continually exposed to the ravages of the more prevalent diseases of the country, and in a very large proportion, without a chance of being relieved: that they die in thousands, not from the original force of disease, but from the want of an asylum like that now proposed, viz. an Hospital.”

Nor is their assertion destitute of sufficient proof to support it. Mr. Martin, in the first Paper he submitted to them, states, from his Medical observation, that “Fever is so universal with the Native, that, until enlarged spleen or bowel complaint (the sequelae to often-repeated fever,) seizes him, he never thinks it necessary to apply for aid; and when he does, it is but to accelerate his fate: the compound of arsenic and spices, or the rude preparation of mercury given by the Native Doctors, is efficacious to rekindle the feeble remains of constitutional power only to sink the more rapidly in death.”

The first observation, accordingly, which your Committee have to make upon this branch of their inquiry, is one, which they think must strike a stranger to be the most remarkable ever made, as applicable to the seat of the Government of a great nation, and the chief emporium of its trade—namely, that there is no place in Calcutta, of the nature of an Hospital, maintained for the reception of any persons of the Native population afflicted with fever or other diseases, the subjects of Medical treatment, except the utterly destitute, who are found lying in the Streets, and whom it is a matter of the Police to remove. For these a small Hospital attached to the Police is provided, which is represented, in the note furnished by the late Dr. Vos, to be of sufficient size for its purpose, to have existed for about sixteen years, and to have owed its existence, as Dr. Vos believed, to W. C. Blaquierre, Esq. the Magistrate. But even this Hospital does not seem, from Dr. Vos's account, to afford the means of separating the patients in the manner necessary to their speedy recovery, or in some cases to their recovering at all; “for it is filled up,” he says, “with all kinds of people, who have disorders of the most contagious, and malignant character, viz. fevers, dysentery, diarrhoea, spleen, syphilis, small pox, and old sores, and often women near their confinement. In case,” he adds, “a Fever Hospital be established, of course they will have the opportunity of entering it earlier, and in a better condition, and thus will have a greater chance to recover; as it is impossible for any man to recover from fever speedily (if at all) whilst in the same place with many labouring under the worst of diseases.”

ON THE USE OF THE BIBLE.

THE LETTER OF FENLON TO THE BISHOP OF ARRAS.

V. It would seem, that the chief causes which compelled the Church to employ the severe measures of her authority,—restricting the reading of the Scriptures to those individuals only, whom she deemed tolerably prepared to read them with profit,—were the pernicious errors, and the conduct, of the Vaudois and the Albigenes. Not, indeed, that I pretend to declare that such restraints began only at the time of these heretics: for, to determine the precise period of the order of this discipline would require, perhaps, a considerable degree of investigation. However, be this as it may, the fact is certain, that, at the time of the aforesaid innovators, the Church, by a melancholy experience, became sensible that even the daily bread of life ought not to be given to children; it became now necessary for their pastors to break it for them; and that this same divine food, which feeds and supports the humble and the docile, becomes a poison to the presumptuous and the untractable. The Vaudois, or the Poor Men of Lyons, pretended that they understood the Scriptures far better than their pastors,—whom, also, they undertook to reform and correct. The Albigenes in like manner, loudly called upon the people,—animating them to examine the Scriptures, by themselves, independently of the explanations of their pastors,—whom, again, they accused of ignorance, and deception. It was, accordingly, against these, and such like innovators, that the Pope,—Innocent the Third,—wrote, as follows, to the Faithful of the diocese of Metz:—“Our venerable Brother, the Bishop of Metz, has, by his letters, informed us, that, in his diocese, and in his town, a considerable multitude of laymen, and women, excited by the wish to read the Scriptures, had got translated into French the Gospels; the Epistles of St. Paul; the Psalms; the Morals of Job; and several other books;—and that some of the clergy having, herewith, blamed them for the innovation, they openly resisted,—pretending to draw reasons from the Scriptures to prove, that they ought not to be molested for what they were doing. Among them, there are some, who go so far as even disgustingly to despise the simplicity of their priests. And when these propose to them the Word of Salvation, then, in their secret murmurings, say, that they know better than their priests how to explain this Word; and that, above all, it is far better explained in their libels. Now, although the desire to understand the Scriptures, and to instruct the public according to the doctrine of these holy books, is, by no means, blameable,—but, on the contrary, praiseworthy;—still, do the aforesaid individuals appear reprehensible in these regards,—that they hold secret assemblies;—that they usurp the ministry of preaching; and that they mock at the simplicity of their priests, &c..” His Holiness adds: “The secret mysteries of Faith ought not to be exposed indifferently to ALL; because ALL are not competent to understand them. They should be exposed to such only, as are disposed to receive them with sincerity of heart. It is for this reason, that St. Paul says to the more simple,—I have given you milk to drink, and not solid food, as to little children in Jesus Christ for solid food, as the Apostle says elsewhere, for those who are grown up. We preach, he adds the wisdom of God among the perfect; but among you, I have judged, that I knew nothing, save Jesus Christ, and Jesus Christ crucified. The depth, fact, of the divine Scriptures, is such, and so great, that, not only the simple and the ignorant, but the wise and the learned themselves, are incapable of penetrating them, so as to acquire a complete understanding of them.”

That spirit of indocility, and insubordination which had thus broken out, and prevailed amongst the laity, is a convincing proof, how dangerous it was to allow the indiscriminate reading of the sacred text to the public, at times when the pastors of the Church neither possessed the ancient authority of their early predecessors; nor their ancient vigilance and care, explaining the holy volume; and when the people, moreover, were taught to contemn the simplicity. Experience, again, made it evident that the fanaticism of the aforesaid laity was contagious; and that they easily seduced the multitude, by promising them to prove, from the Scriptures, that the clergy were a set of ignorant and artful impostors,—wholly unworthy of the sacred ministry. Thus, Wycliff, too, as Luther, and Calvin,—and, in fact, all the sect-ists of the sixteenth century, perverted, and abused, these words: “Scrutamini Scripturas” (Search the Scriptures.) They reduced the Church to the necessity of restricting the public from the indiscriminate use of the Bible; and from the reading of it, without the permission of their pastors.*

* At the time when Luther began the Reformation and for some years after, there did not exist any Canon nor any kind of restriction, prohibiting the use, reading, of the Bible. On the contrary, the Church, far from withholding the Sacred Volume, or discouraging its use, laboured every where to promote it, and was eager for its circulation. Thus, no sooner had the art of printing begun to prevail,—and long before a Protestant version was known, there had been printed and published a variety of Catholic translations. In Italy alone, there had been published upwards of forty,—and these, moreover, sanctioned by the approval of the Popes, Bishops, Cardinals, &c.

The circumstance, which gave occasion to the alteration of this discipline, was the abuse made of the sacred book by the first Reformers. These men, anxious to gain abettors to their revolution, and to secure the favour of their new opinions, perverted and misapplied it, for these purposes, in a great variety of passages; and prodigally circulating these false versions engaged multitudes of the public to read them. The more, moreover, at the same time, loudly and incessantly proclaimed, that the Bible, and the Bible alone, is the rule of the Christian's faith; and that the reason each individual is its sole interpreter. Flattered by these principles, so gratifying to self-love, and the love of liberty,—an immense portion of the public, ear and very ardently, embraced them. They read, judged, and decided for themselves. We know the consequences. Soon, confusion everywhere took place and error, at once prevailed in every shape that fanaticism and folly could devise. It was, accordingly, under these circumstances, and in this state of things, that the Church, as the guardian of the Scriptures and of the Faithful, deemed it prudent to interfere; and, if possible, to check the growth of the alarming evil. For this purpose, therefore, it issued those regulations which are denominated “The Index.” By these, it w

VI. The learned Gerson,—who certainly cannot be accused of having favoured the maxims of the Ultramontanists,—writes, nevertheless, as follows:—“It is from this empsoned source, (the alleged right of reading, and interpreting, the Bible,) that come forth and every day increase the errors of the Beguards; of the Poor men of Lyons; and of all other innovators, who resemble them. Among all these, there are many laymen, who translate the Bible into the vulgar tongue, to the great prejudice and scandal of the Catholic truth.”—He elsewhere adds:—“The translations of the Scriptures in the vulgar languages,—And, above all, the translation of our Bible, (the French version) ought to be prevented,—save those parts which regard morals and certain portions of history.”—He still farther, says:—“It is a thing too replete with danger, to give the Bible, translated into French, to a set of simple and ignorant men, because by interpreting it wrong, they may fall, at once, into errors. Their duty, is to listen to the Divine Word, delivered to them by the mouth of their preachers: for else, all preaching is in vain.” The sentiments of Gerson are founded upon the following reflection:—“Precisely as from a good and faithful version of the Bible into French, men might derive a certain share of benefit,—provided they read and understood it with sobriety,—so, on the contrary, if the sacred book be ill translated, or presumptuously explained,—rejecting the sense and interpretations of the Holy Fathers,—it must, of course, become the source required, that, before the laity indiscriminately should be allowed to read the Bible, they should, first, have applied for the approbation, and have obtained the permission of their respective pastors or superiors. Considering, indeed, the temper and confusion of the times; the sanctity of the divine book; and how greatly it was everywhere abused;—considering all this, it cannot but be admitted, that, to guard the holy volume, by some kind of regulation, from farther profanation and abuse, was but an act of pastoral prudence and Christian piety. Thus, in this country, in consequence of the confusion and disorders created by the indiscriminate use of the Bible, there was, early issued an Act of Parliament, approved and sanctioned by Craumer himself, restricting the reading of it to such persons only, as were supposed to be competent to understand and explain it properly.

In regard, however, of the regulations of the above-mentioned decree,—those of the “Index,”—it must be remarked, that they were designed to be only temporary and local,—confined to the time whilst the mischiefs of error were increasing; and limited to such dioceses, as were deemed the most openly exposed to the dangers of contagion. In fact, although admitted in certain dioceses, they were, also, in many dioceses rejected. At present,—now that the fierce spirit of innovation has, comparatively speaking, subsided,—they are rejected every where. They are obsolete things,—a mere dead letter: so that, now, the Catholic Church imposes no more restrictions upon the use and reading of the Bible, than do any of the Protestant sects.

If, indeed, since the periods above alluded to,—or even recently—certain Bulls, or rescripts, have been issued by the Popes relating to the Bible,—these do not regard the reading itself of the sacred book, but only certain false and corrupted versions of it which are now in circulation; and circulated, above all, so prodigally, by the zeal and bigotry of the Bible Societies. And, surely, to condemn false versions, and to warn the Faithful against them, is no other than an act of enlightened pastoral, and Christian vigilance: for the Bible, falsely translated, is no longer the Word of God.—Ed.

of errors and of evils without number.”—In reality, such is the case:—We know, by experience, that it is by means of the versions of the Bible, and by the aid of its arbitrary interpretation, that the Protestants have laboured to overturn the fabric of the ancient Church. It was thus,—by this flattering assurance,—that the people were seduced to believe, that they would discover and clearly behold the truth, in the pages of the sacred volume.

VII. It was under the apprehension of the aforesaid evils, that the Faculty of Theology in Paris condemned, in the year 1527, certain propositions of Erasmus, who had said, that “if his opinions were adopted and followed,—then labourers, masons, and every other class of artisans, should read the Bible, and that, moreover, it ought to be translated into every kind of language.” The Faculty, in reply to these propositions, declared,—that the Vaudois, the Albigenes, and the Tarpuins, have demonstrated clearly, how dangerous it is to allow indiscriminately the reading of the Bible in the vulgar languages: for, although such privilege might eventually be a service to certain individuals,—yet, it would be wrong to concede it indiscreetly, and without reserve, to all persons without distinction.” In regard of the laity, the Faculty again adds:—“that the Church does not prohibit these from reading certain books of the Scriptures, which might serve for their edification, and the improvement of their morals,—but, having still an explication appended to them, adapted to the measure of their capacities.”

VIII. The Clergy of the Church of France appear to have followed the same maxims: for, in the letter which they addressed to the Pope, Alexander the Seventh, concerning Voisin's French translation of the Missal, they say:—“We have been watchful over this innovation, and have wholly condemned it, as contrary to the discipline of the Church and as dangerous to the Faithful.”

Thus also, in like manner they cite, and approve of the censure, which the Faculty of Paris had formerly passed upon the propositions of Erasmus,—remarking, how much the Vaudois, or Poor Men of Lyons, had abused the familiar reading of the Bible; and that it was this—this unrestricted liberty of reading the sacred volume,—that had subsequently given birth to all the sects of the Reformation; and “that, previously, it had opened the way,”—as the Faculty of Paris had remarked in its censure,—“to the errors of the Bohemians.” In short, the Clergy cite the words of St. Vincent of Lerins, who says, that “the Scripture,”—on account of the subtilties, by which men turn its various texts against the authority of the Church,—is called “the Book of Heretics.” The Pope Alexander VII. having received the above letter, replied to it; “by condemning the rashness of those, who, without any authority, had presumed to make, and to place in the hands of all kind of persons, of every state and sex the aforesaid French translations.”

IX. From the above facts, and consideration, I, therefore, infer, that the Church, without changing any of its fundamental maxims, deemed it still necessary to change in some degree, the order of its conduct in relation to the reading of the Bible. As the Clergy possessed less authority, and were less assiduous in the explanation of the sacred text,—whilst the public also were more indocile and presumptuous,—disposed to listen with curiosity to every fanatic and innovator,—so, of course, the Church deemed it an act of prudence to grant fewer facilities; and to employ more precautions, than what she had generally and at more happy periods been wont to concede to the Faithful. Thus, looking back to the bright ages of Christian piety, we remark that this same Church permitted the simple laity to carry to their respective homes or to take with them on their journeys the holy Eucharist. The reason was, because her pastors then were assured of the purity of their lives; and of the zeal and modesty of their whole conduct; whereas, now, she gives the holy communion only in her churches; and this, too, with a great deal of watchfulness and caution. It is not therefore, the Church that changes; but the public, who are altered; and by the alteration, rendering necessary a change of her former discipline. Moreover, it is again true, that during the first ages the Church did not allow the reading of the Scriptures, save with a dependence upon the direction of her pastors, who prepared the Faithful for the awful task; and who only admitted them to undertake this, in proportion as they found them sufficiently advanced in knowledge, and in piety, to do so with advantage. And even then, as we have seen in St. Jerome, the individual who was allowed to read the sacred volumes, read only certain books one after the other and accordingly as his pastor judged that it was right; and proper time to do so. What, then, the Church has practised, in these times, is simply the fact of more, or less. It is the same order of economy, the same method and the same dependence. The only difference is, that the Church has augmented her restrictions and multiplied her precautions, in proportion to the indisposition, and the disorders of the public.

X. In regard to our Low Countries,—the condemnation of the translated Bibles there, and the restrictions imposed upon the laity not to read indiscriminately, were perhaps more severe than those which were enforced in other countries. The reasons were,—the evils and the errors which the Reformers of those parts had every where diffused in the time of the Duchess of Parma;—the vicinity of Holland;—and the great submission, which, hitherto, those provinces had paid to the Holy See,—motives, which rendered the increase of watchfulness and precaution the more necessary. It was hence, that the Council of the province of Cambray, which was held at Mons in the year 1583 declares, as follows:—“No one among the laity shall be at liberty to read the Sacred Scriptures in the vulgar language, in opposition to the fourth Rule of the Index, respecting forbidden books, unless it be by the permission of the Bishops, or their delegates.” It was in conformity with this regulation, that my late predecessor, Archbishop De Brias, published, in 1690, a Charge, designed to appease certain disturbances, which had taken place at Mons, concerning this subject of reading the Bible in the vulgar tongue. In this, he speaks as follows:—“With all the tenderness of our heart, we implore all those, whom God has committed to our care, to listen with earnest attention and piety to the Word of God, delivered to them, whether by the instructions of their catechisms, or by the means of sermons. For, by the aid of these, they may derive those lights, which are necessary to direct their conduct, in a way that is better, and more nearly proportioned to their weakness, than by their own private reading of the Holy Scripture,—a divine book, unsuited to be placed indifferently in the hands of all orders and conditions, of the public. It is for this reason, that the Church, as a wise and charitable Mother, has ever properly reserved to herself the power of permitting, or restricting the reading of it. Neither can anything be more absurd than the insolence of those men, who represent her as cruel, because she sometimes refuses to her children the food which they are not able to digest. We, therefore, thus consider ourselves bound in charity to make use of the like precaution in regard of those for which we shall, one day, have to answer before God.”

XI. From the above considerations, I infer, my Lord, that the Church, in seeming to change a somewhat of her external discipline, has not, in fact, altered, in any respect, her real and genuine maxims. She has always invariably preserved two of these,—the first, to give the Sacred Scripture to all those among her children whom she deemed properly prepared to read them with advantage “not to cast pearls to swine,” and, therefore, not to place the divine volume in the hands of men, who would read and interpret it to their ruin. In the early ages of Christian piety, when the Faithful were simple, docile and attached to the instructions of their pastors, she confided it to them; because she was then convinced, that they were solidly instructed, and well prepared to read it with fruit and edification. But, in these times, seeing that men are become presumptuous, indocile,—critics, seeking in the Scriptures for arguments against the Scriptures, in order to confirm themselves in their incredulity;—or else, directing the sacred pages against the pastor of the Church, in order to shake off her authority;—seeing this, it became but an act of prudence and necessity, to restrict the reading of the holy volume, which, although so salutary in itself, is thus rendered so dangerous by the use which the laity, for the most part, have made,—and still make,—of it. My opinion is, that we ought never to separate these two maxims of the Church;—one of them, to allow the reading of the Scriptures to such only as are already disposed and fitted to read them to advantage; the other to labour incessantly to prepare the Faithful for the useful task. If you rest easy under the supposition, that the Faithful are all of them, without any effectual preparation, already prepared to read them, you, in this case, nourish their curiosity, their presumption and the rashness of their criticism;—you feed them,—as we see done every day,—with the Scriptures themselves. If, on the contrary, you make the supposition, that the Faithful are not, as yet, sufficiently fitted for the useful reading,—neglecting, at the same time, to prepare them carefully for it,—you, in this case, deprive them, both of the consolations and the benefits which the first Christians were wont to derive from the sacred pages. My conclusion, therefore, is, that it is the duty of the priesthood to endeavour, with siduous care, to prepare and dispose the Faithful for the important study;—that we ought to look upon those alone, as truly instructed, and solidly fixed in Jesus Christ, who have been prudently trained and fortified to digest this divine bread of the strong;—and that, moreover, according to the decisions of the most experienced directors, the surest method of doing this, is to proceed gradually in putting the different books of the sacred code in the hands of the people, according to the measure of their capacities to understand them, and to their dispositions to revere them,—saying to such as are not as yet, thus sufficiently prepared:—“Non potestis portare modo; poteritis autem postea.”

THE CATHOLIC PRINCIPLE.

Can the Catholic Principle be “Illustrated by the Bible, by common sense or reason, or by anything but self assumed arrogant authority or ecclesiastical despotism?”

As the Evangelist has given up the argument regarding our illustration from Millerism, we now come to discuss the question to which he invited us, and we put it at the head, in his own words. The Catholic principle is this.—Believe the word of God, written or unwritten. If any difficulty arise regarding its meaning, adhere to the interpretation of the universal Church in preference to your own, or that of any other individual. By doing so you are sure to be right, for God will assist his Church and prevent her from sanctioning error.

This is the principle which our contemporary says cannot be illustrated by the Bible, by common sense or reason.

Let us try; we shall begin with the last. Let us compare our principle to that embodied in the form of government of all civilized communities. This may be taken, we presume, as no unfair specimen of common sense.

In every civilized community that we know there is not only a written law, but there is invariably a tribunal provided to which difficult cases are referred. If any one asserted that the existence of such tribunals was incompatible with a due respect for the written law, he would be laughed at. If the decisions of the tribunal were of no force, but every one were warranted, still worse if every one were required to follow his own construction of the law after the decision, such tribunals would be almost, if not entirely, useless.

Now, why should the Christian society be left by its Founder without those requisites for self-preservation, which are found necessary in every other society. Every where else the living authority is so important, that though societies may be pointed out without written laws, none ever yet existed without a living authority to preserve it from falling into decay.

Is it that the written word which God gave to his Church is not liable to be misinterpreted by the unlearned and unstable?—is it that there never is a doubt of the true meaning of its teaching?

Look around through our own city, and what is its most remarkable feature? Churches packed together, in which clergymen are preaching, literally within hearing of one another, all from the same Bible, all saying it is perfectly clear, and scarcely two of them agreeing in assigning its meaning.

And is it really so much against “reason and common sense,” that nothing but “self assumed arrogant authority or ecclesiastical despotism” could give rise to the idea, that this state of things was not intended by the Saviour, but that foreseeing it He provided a remedy in the teaching of his Apostles yet living in their successors, who confiding in the assistance of the Man-God, who, sent them and promised to be with them to the end of time, will always form one firm point, around which we may rally, and be sure that the storm will not shake us?

But, is not “illustration” of our principle afforded by the Bible? Let us see.

How did Christ provide for communicating to the world, the saving truths of His Gospel? One who was unacquainted with these matters would imagine, that those who lay such stress on all the sufficiency of the written Bible, without any authorized interpreter, could point out in that book some very clear testimony to prove, that He decreed that a Bible should be written, that all should read it, should believe it, and that an assurance the most explicit was given that by this course they would attain a certain knowledge of everything necessary to be known.

But, so far from this being the case, in all the lessons which are recorded to have been delivered by him not one word is said, not an allusion is made to the very project of anything having been written at all to explain his doctrine. We nowhere read that he commanded it, that he advised it, that he suggested it. When his disciples did write they nowhere state, that this was their object, they nowhere tell us what was written, or intended to be written, and you will search the book itself in vain for the least intimation, that it was designed, or calculated to be read by every one, much less to become the only source of knowledge, by which a Christian man should be guided.

But we do find, that Christ provided teachers to announce His Gospel to the world. The commission given them embraces “all things” whatsoever He commanded, it reaches to “all nations,” it lasts to the “consummation of the world.” In executing this commission they point for their authority to Him, who sent them, even as he was sent by the Father, who said to them “he who hears you hears me.” They do not rely on their own strength in discharging this duty, they confide in Him who promised He would be with them: they know that, like their fellow men, they too may be tossed about by error, but they look to the “Spirit of truth” whom He hath sent, and sent “to teach them all things, and to abide with them for ever.”

Here again we ask, is it necessary to have recourse to ecclesiastical despotism, to say that the ministry which Christ thus established on earth, will be protected from error, and that the Christian desirous of knowing His truth should cling to the teachings of those whom he thus sent, and be sure that thus he is guarded from error?

Christ founded a Church. This cannot be denied. He did not leave it to men to do this, and for one are many to suit their own fancy? He founded one, and but one; he provided it with officers who had all the necessary powers to secure the objects for which he established them. Christ not only founded a Church, he died to sanctify it, he espoused it to himself, and he promised that the gates of Hell should not prevail against it. By his institution and in consequence of the firmness which he imparted to it, it became as "a pillar and ground of truth."

And yet a Christian man knows no game but "self assumed arrogant authority," and "ecclesiastical despotism" for the claim put forward to our submission by this authorized messenger of Christ.

But what is there to warrant this unaccountable reluctance? The opposition of her teaching, we are told, to God's word. The opposition of the teaching of Christ's Church, to the written word inspired by him! We ask emphatically, can this be? Can the spouse of Christ, cleansed by his blood, the Church which he set up as a "pillar and ground of truth," that Church against which the power of Hell itself cannot triumph, can that Church be supposed to be permitted by God to lend the whole weight of its authority to anything really opposed to the true meaning of his written word? Can the Apostles teaching in her, and executing through those who shall hold their place to the consummation of the world, the commission confided to them, can they be thought to be abandoned by God, and now teach the contrary of what they committed to writing under the influence of inspiration? Let the unworthy thought be banished for ever.

But you think the two are in opposition. Ah! you think so. And whence comes it that you promise to yourself such acute discernment, that you can see an opposition which is not observed and was not observed for centuries by the universal Church on earth. You have seized the true meaning of the text. Have you then received a promise of more ample assistance than was vouchsafed by Christ, to the rest of the Church, so that while that body founded by him, lapsed into idolatry; and superstition, and darkness sat brooding over the world for centuries, the saints and martyrs and doctors of the Church were all in error, all ignorant of what was yet so plain, while "reason" and "common sense," and "the Bible" were all reserved till your advent to the world, to shed their light upon you.

How humble the position assumed by Protestantism; how exalted the notion it inspires of the power and mercies of a Saviour, who died to redeem the world, but whose saving influence was not felt in any fullness till Luther thought fit to quarrel with the Pope about indulgences! —Pittsburgh Catholic.

On the 24th April three Jesuit Fathers and a lay brother embarked at St. Louis for Independence, on their way to Oregon Mission. When they arrived there will be twelve Fathers and eighty lay brothers employed on that interesting mission.—Ibid.

The Church Register, a Protestant paper, had stated in one of its articles that the Catholic Journals had admitted that, as regarded converts, more were lost than gained, and had insinuated that none of note were being added to the church. The Catholic Herald replies: "The Catholic journals have not at all allowed that we lose more converts than we gain; on the contrary, we believe that at least fifty come to the church from deep conviction, for one that deliberately forsakes it. We have admitted that it may be doubtful whether we lose more than we gain, considering the number of poor orphans who are bound out to Protestants, and who are trained up by them, and the number of neglectful adults who live far from religious influences, and who virtually abandon all religion, leaving their children under the direction of a Protestant wife, or husband; but no one can call persons so trained converts to Protestantism, although they be lost to Catholicity. As to converts of note, if rank in society be meant, there have been many in Baltimore, some in this city, and elsewhere within a short period.—Ibid."

CONVERSION.—Mr. Thomas Hercules de Patras de Champaigne, a member of one of the most ancient families of Boulogne, abjured Protestantism at Paris on the 15th February. His mother, an English lady, a short time previously made her abjuration.—Ibid.

PRESBYTERIAN VISIT TO DANIEL O'CONNELL, ESQ., M.P., AND THE OTHER STATE PRISONERS.—The Rev. William Hugh Doherty, Presbyterian Minister of Comber, in the county of Down, and Moderator of the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster, paid a visit to Mr. O'Connell, at the Richmond Penitentiary, yesterday, for the purpose of expressing his thanks to that honourable and learned gentleman, and through him to all the Roman Catholics of Ireland, both in and out of Parliament, for the generous and powerful support which they had given to his Synod in the matter of the Dissenters' Chapels Bill. The Rev. Moderator also expressed his hopes of a speedy and favourable decision by the House of Lords on the writ of error, and the consequent termination of Mr. O'Connell's unjust imprisonment; and stated for himself, and all the Liberal Presbyterians of Ulster, that, although they may differ from their fellow-countrymen, the Roman Catholics of Ireland, on the question of Repeal, they are (as far as he knows) perfectly unanimous in believing what Lord John Russell affirmed in the British Parliament, that "Mr. O'Connell has not had a fair trial." Mr. O'Connell, in reply, thanked Mr. Doherty for his good wishes, and said that he had acted on principle with regard to the Dissenters' Chapels Bill, wishing to protect innocent men from robbery—he could not qualify the term in the least—from robbery!—and declared that Mr. Doherty and the gentlemen with whom he acted, would always find him the firm, constant, and zealous friend of civil and religious liberty.—Freeman, of Tuesday.

INTERESTING LETTER ON THE HABITS AND CUSTOMS OF THE KOOKBES TRIBE.

We have been favored with the following interesting letter from the Rev. Mr. Barbo of Chittagong, to the address of His Grace the Archbishop:—

Chittagong, October 28th, 1844.

MY LORD,—Having read a long time ago in different works the most shocking account of the Langate, or Kookees, as they are generally called, living in the forests of Chittagong and the Tippera district, during my stay in this station, I collected some information of the habits and customs of that tribe. It is not extraordinary to see persons who live at a great distance from those villages, misrepresenting them; generally speaking, they copy what has been said by former authors, not better instructed than themselves, and what is more extraordinary, that people here have the same opinion of them. They are represented as cannibals, and savage tribes offering in sacrifice not only their slaves, but even their relations.

The few Bengalees and Mussulmen who sit them, deceived, perhaps, by seeing dead bodies kept in houses, which are no other than those of their relations, which they reserve for one year, paint them in the same colours. The English who rule this district, for many years, know no more about the people living forty miles from this station, than they did when they first settled here, and consequently nothing has been done or attempted to civilize them. Did the Kookees judge the character of our rulers from the disposition of the few persons who visit them, they must have conceived very prejudicial ideas of the English Government.

The Mugs, an Arracanese extraction, living on the banks of the river, or on the hills joining it, are about 2,000 in number; a part of them pay revenue to the Ranee, and the other part to the Bhomenggee. These two persons are tributary to the English. The wives of the Mugs are settled at Chittagong, but they complain most bitterly of being obliged to go to such a distance, their case being sometimes very trifling, and they being under the necessity of employing interpreters to have the case brought on. It occasionally happens, that they are detained a long time in this station, before their case is settled, and after expending money for the Vakeel and Interpreter, they are sometimes obliged to leave the case pending in the court to visit their homes, when their adversaries, taking advantage of their absence, have the case brought on, and of course dismissed, they not being present to answer it. The Government could very easily put a stop to their complaints, by appointing one or two respectable Mugs to settle the disputes of their countrymen, and as it is the custom of the Burmese Judges to take the advice of the most respectable people in the village where they live, before they pass sentence, I am sure that the Chittagong authorities would be very seldom troubled by their appeals.

I had been long desirous to visit the Kookees and examine their character and social institutions, but my clerical duties here had always prevented me. A favourable opportunity at length offered, and on the 23th of the last month, I proceeded from Chittagong in a small boat, to see these interesting people. Both sides of the river are well cultivated. Small villages inhabited by Mussulmen or fishermen, are very numerous. We passed the foot of the Heco Hills, elevated about 150 feet above the level of the water; no boats pass them without abusing or calling the Crama or echo. I reached a small Mug village where a Burman was living who had promised to accompany me to the Kookees. In the evening we entered the territories of the Ranee; there is a Chokie where all boats going to cut timber and bamboo are obliged to pay so much for each person on board. We passed the Setetagra, called blue hills, elevated 1,500 feet above the water, some spots of ground might be seen cultivated, with sheds built over them.

To the South of these hills, are some beautiful plains where the Gaial* is found. The wild goat † with strong and straight horns, hair about one foot in length, of white colour, with some black spots, is seen there. The Gibbons, of which there are two species, one of a black colour, with the forehead and beard white, called Hooloo, and the other of a brown colour is also found. ‡ At the foot of those hills, I found a plant bearing a strong resemblance to tea, a specimen of which I have sent to the Museum. This shrub is very common on the Tenasserim coast and is known to the Burmese by the name of wild Tea § or "To ladpe". In the evening we reached another Mug Village. Some of the people there, whom I had known at Chintagong, offered to accompany me to the Kookees; as they had a boat smaller than mine, I accepted their offer. We started in the night; at 6 o'clock in the morning we reached a nearly perpendicular rock elevated about an hundred feet above the water. The legend says, that a king who had an only daughter, offered her hand to the young man who could climb the rock. Seven persons began the ascent and proceeded more or less in the task, but the whole of them fell and became the victims of the Cacca Cupido. The eighth was more fortunate, and he received the reward of the fair maiden's hand.

We saw several deserted villages. During this year, many persons living on the banks of the river, have been the victims of Cholera. We entered in the evening the Kaide whose direction is East and South East. There was so little water, that we were obliged to remove the few things we had on board of the small boat. At six in the evening we rested, and the people, kindling fire on the banks of the river, slept as comfortably as if they were under the shelter of their houses. On either side of this creek, hills nearly perpendicular, their base resting on the water's edge, rise to the summit of from 100 to 200 feet. They were covered to the top with shrubs, wild plaintains and other variety of plants. On the evening of the next day, we reached a large Mug Village composed of 80 houses. We saw only one person in it, as the people had gone to the different hills for their harvest and were not expected to return till November. I sent for the head man, who came with a few followers, bringing fowls, rice and fruit; he promised to accompany me on the next day to the Kookees, and said that (understanding something of their language) he could be of service to me. I gladly embraced the offer, and we started early in the morning and ascended steep hills raised about 200 feet above the level of the creek. The track was what the Burmese call "Myouk Lan," or monk pathway. The bamboos and high grass on both sides of the way, saturated with the heavy dew of the night, were so close together, that it was with the greatest difficulty we could ascend. From the top of the hill we could see the Kookee villages appearing quite near, lying towards the East. We could also perceive on different hills, some patches of cultivated ground, and with temporary sheds raised from ten to twelve feet from the surface. But the greatest part of the country was covered with bamboos and some large trees. We then descended to a small stream by the precipitous side of the hill, and followed its course for a mile, being obliged to wade knee deep in the water. We had to proceed in this way, on account of the narrow bed of the stream, in single file. On the way, one of my people happened to catch hold of a creeping plant, called by the Mug "Menzonge," and whose touch produces a prickly sensation similar to that of the nettle. For three days it tormented him with severe pain. Close to this plant we discovered another of the parasite nature "foli lanceolatis," about ten inches long, the extremities of whose topmost leaves being furnished with roots, bend downwards and so propagate its species. Following the course of the stream, we came to a wider one running at the foot of the Kookees hill, and which discharges itself in the Kaddai about five miles to the south. We then ascended a hill of a scaly structure, which was very steep for the first twenty feet. The ascent was nearly perpendicular. Some crevices of the rock and holes made in it, were the only places where we could fix the extremity of our feet. To ascend with our shoes on, was out of the question. The remainder of the way was sufficiently easy, and after ascending 150 feet, we gained the summit. We saw a range of houses built in as regular a structure as the nature of the ground could admit. These dwellings are formed entirely of bamboos, the walls, supporters, floors and roof being covered with its leaves. They are elevated from the ground about five or six feet. The Kookees remaining only for the period of four or five years on the same hill, these houses are intended by them to last only so long. These buildings consist of two verandahs and two rooms. In one verandah they pound rice and keep the heads of the wild animals which they kill in their hunting sions. The other serves them for culipurposes. In the Village there are two s, one intended for the reception of gers and the other for their public amuse-

s. On one side of the hill, about 50 feet ds its declivity, is a beautiful spring supplies the Village; the water is car-up by women and children on their in bamboos and courges, in conical ts fastened by a flat rattan strap pass-round their foreheads. The hill being v inaccessible from three sides, these arms are spears, arrows and muskets, last are imported by the Bengalee and ulmen traders, who exchange them for a, rice and ivory. Some of these spears, ufactured by the Kookees themselves,

f such excellent material, so well temper-nd sharp pointed, that they are capabilling holes in the blades of their knives.
n I arrived in the Village, the greater part e inhabitants had gone to their work.
e first year they cultivate the adjacent but as they cannot raise a crop on the ground the following year, in consece of the rich surface being washed by the heavy rains which fall in tor-during the South-west Monsoon, they forced to a great distance from their lings, in search of a more favourable

Afraid, however, of an attack from the Kookees, or Kions, they seldom remain f their village during the night. Every therefore, they must clear new ground by g large trees and bamboo, which work perform during the cold season, and in months of April and May they burn the timber. When the rains set in, small are dug, in which Paddy mixed with on seed are deposited. The Paddy is in August or September, and the Cotton ovember or December. They plant also, vegetables, such as pumpkins and gourds.
his season grow also in the open field ons of exquisite flavour. It is written he Burmese books that there are one lred and ten nations in the world, and hundred and twenty species of rice.

A person well informed has told me, that fifty to sixty species of Paddy are on the hills of this district. The dy varies in produce, according to the ity of the soil. Some of the Ranganhai give a produce from 70 to 80 fold, but rally speaking, if the produce be from 30, the natives are content. This year ng proved unfavourable, the produce has aged but 12 fold.

On the Tenasserim coast, there is a species of Paddy of a very small kind, cultivated on the hills close to the sea, which gives a produce from 80 to an 100 fold.

Having ascertained that the people would not return from the labours of the field till after sunset, I descended the hill, to follow the course of the stream. A woman who appeared about 80 years of age, pointed out to us another path, which I took in preference to the one by which I ascended, thinking it to be of more easy descent. I was sadly disappointed, and had I not caught hold of the straggling branches and bamboos by the way, I should have reached the bottom of the hill in a much quicker space of time than would be desirable. The path was furrowed by the track of the species of wild cow called by the Kookees, Shio, and by the Bengalese, Surgai. Had I not seen their traces, I could never have believed, that an animal of such large dimensions, was capable of descending so precipitous a way. I ascertained from the person who accompanied me, that the Shio can follow a man through the steepest defile. We saw at the foot of the hill, two females of these animals with their young ones. One of them was entirely black, with the exception of the forehead, which in these animals is invariably grey; the other was of a dun colour, with the exception of the belly, legs and the extremity of the thighs, which were white.
The female goes with young for nine months.
The horns are directed backwards and marked by longitudinal ridges. The horns of the two females which I saw, were not longer than one foot; but I obtained the horn of a bull which was two feet four inches long and 15 inches in circumference. I measured a female who had reached her full growth, of the following dimensions:

1. From the muzzle to the root of the thigh, 9 feet, 7 inches.
2. Tail, 3 feet, 6 inches.
3. From the tip of the shoulder to the ground, 4 feet, 6 inches.
4. Do. behind, 4 feet, 2 inches.
5. The circumference of the body was 7 feet.

The Kookees, Mugs and Bengalese say that this Shio is different from the Gaijal.
The shape of the body, the collar, the skin that falls down the front of the neck, the edge of which is clothed with long, black hair, is not seen in the Gaijal. Several of these bovine species have been sent from Chittagong to Calcutta by the name of Gaijal.
Although called by the name of wild cow, they are, in reality, tame, remaining the greatest part of the day close to the house and feeding principally on bamboo leaves. I was particularly struck with the ingenious dexterity by which these animals approach the leaves of the bamboo tree. They bend it with the neck and continue keeping it bent, till they reach its topmost leaf. In the village are kept from 50 to 60 of these animals; amongst them is a large bull who generally strays into the jungle for four or six days and then returns to the herd. They are never yoked to any work. In their great festivals they are slaughtered.

We followed the creek which was from 4 to 5 feet in breadth. This excellent spring was one of the best natural beauties I ever saw. It glides along a bed of variegated shells and passes between two ranges of nearly perpendicular hills, rising from the water from 100 to 200 feet. Bamboos, shrubs and trees growing from out the crevices of the rock, twisting their branches with those of the opposite side, so beautifully shadowed the place, that not a single ray of the meridian sun could pierce the umbragious foliage. We waded against the current for about two hours, enjoying nearly the whole time the same picturesque and refreshing scenery. On some spot covered with sand, could be distinguished the traces of two tigers, who had been, the preceeding night, prowling there in search of prey. We also saw birds of beautiful plumage, and I was fortunate enough to kill some which I stuffed and sent to the Museum. Amongst them was the Hynet Meng, or Governor bird, of red colour, with the head and wings black. I killed also a large brown monkey with a long tail.

We ascended the Kookees hill by the third side. The ascent was nearly as perpendicular as the other two, but being more frequented, as it led to the cultivated grounds, the path was better. The village contains about 70 houses and about 300 inhabitants. The people returned from their field occupations at 6 o'clock, in one body. They brought in their conical baskets of paddy and vegetables. Some of the young men were armed with spears or firelocks. They were, of course, surprised to see amongst them a white face, but manifested neither alarm nor anxiety. They all approached close to me, remaining there for some time, and presented me with fruits and vegetables. The Kookees, are of a fair complexion and much resemble the Burmese in feature: round face, flat nose, large holes in their ears, long hair which they tie in the same fashion on the forehead as the Burmese, or behind as do the Mugs of the country. They are strongly built, but lower in stature than the Burmese. Men and women are but scantily clothed, the former wearing a piece of cloth of about one foot square, in front, whilst the latter are covered all around the waist, the cloth, however, does not extend to the knees. Some of the young females wore a black covering of the like dimension, ornamented with a kind of fruit, inserted in the manner of bead-work and according to their notions, tastefully arranged. The complexion of some of the females was very fair and of mild expression of countenance. The women are decorated with glass beads round the neck. They in general prefer those of a red colour. The young men wear silver bracelets and above the elbow, rings of polished iron, nearly 2 inches in thickness. They appeared vigorous and hale. I admired the strength of these people and the activity and vigour of the females, particularly, when I beheld young girls from eight to ten years carrying up the steep on their backs and fastened on their forehead, the conical baskets of the country filled to overflowing with fruits and vegetables. I also remarked an aged couple of 8 years each, ascending the hill, walking with all the elasticity of youth and bearing on their backs a load which would weary much younger persons not habituated to the toil. But the Kookees do not invariably enjoy the same rude health; this I ascertained during the visit which I made last year to Barracool, on the Great Lake, where I learned from the people whom I had sent to the Kookees, that they appeared to be very sickly. Many of the children were affected with dropsical tumour in their legs and arms, and the greatest portion of the grown population were attacked with the itch. There is no doubt, but that the hills when not cleared are very insalubrious. The decayed leaves falling in the water, which then becomes vitiated, is, in the opinion of the inhabitants the chief cause of their sickly condition. They say, that in the hills, copper ore is found to some extent; if such be the case the water flowing from the hill, becoming impregnated with the mineral properties, as is, therefore, vitiated.

After their meal, the men came to converse with me, and commenced speaking the subject of religion; but I could not make myself sufficiently understood nor clearly convey to them the important truths of Christianity, as the Mug who served as interpreter, knew very little of their language. Some of the Kookees understand much of the Mug dialect, as barely enabling them to transact the necessary business of barter.

They then brought a large earthen vessel, called Chattah, filled with rice, which had been boiled one year before, and, by being exposed to the sun, was preserved perfectly dry. They mixed with it certain ingredients with whose peculiar properties I am unacquainted, upon which they poured water which produced fermentation. After this process, they racked off the spirit into another Chattah, by means of two bamboos joined at the ends and forming a figure somewhat triangular; one leg of which was placed in the Chattah vat, and, by means of suction, they carried off the liquor into the other Chattah. They offered me some, which, not to displease them, I accepted. The liquor was tasteless and appeared without body; but I could learn, that, when taken in large quantities, it causes sickening intoxication. All who were present drank after me. During the time of the potation, the music commenced, which was composed of three different instruments, the big drum, a cource in which were fixed six bamboo pipes which when blown through, produced a melodious sound, and two horns of the wild cow, which were struck in the manner of a cymbal. Then one of the eldest of the party, commenced the dance in the same fashion as the Burmese perform it. At 12 o'clock at night, the party retired, with the exception of a few of the young men, who slept in the house with me. Early in the morning, the children and adults, male and female, armed with spears, departed in company for their daily labours.

The two chiefs of the village, accompanied by other persons, brought me some fowls, rice and different fruits. I took advantage of the occasion to speak to them on the existence and attributes of the one true God, but I was very imperfectly understood by them. They promised to visit me at Chitagon next month, after their harvest was collected. Should they fulfil their promise, I would recommend that some of them be retained here for the purpose of religious instruction, and, in the event of their not wishing to remain, that your Grace would send them a clergyman who, after learning their language, which may be easily acquired, would teach them the saving doctrines of Christianity. I have written 80 words of the Kookees language, the fourth part of which is Burmese*.

These hill tribes are unacquainted with letters, and their method of computing time is by calculating the number of the successive crops which they grow on the mountain. When, for instance, speaking to a man who told me that his age was 35 years, I asked him, how did he know his precise age? He replied, I was born on such a hill where we had four crops, and from thence we went to another, when we had three, and so on. Thus, by adding together the crops, he arrived at the number of the years.

Two of the most respectable men accompanied me to my boat, where I presented them in return for their civilities, medicine, powder, &c. They furnished me with the following information

They admit the existence of a Supreme Being, but do not worship him, as far as I could collect from them, on the principle that He, being good, he will not harm them, and that, therefore, it is useless to adore Him. So it is with the Kreians on the Tenasserim coast who worship no God, but sacrifice to the Devil. They say that the Supreme Being came from heaven and summoned all nations to give them a code of worship on a certain high mountain. The Kreians, who were engaged in the cultivation of their fields, could not attend on the day appointed, but did on the following one, where they did not meet God who had departed from the mountain. They supplicated him for the law, and he heard their prayer and left it on the mountain, but the rain came and disfigured it. They then exposed it to the sun, but the fowls of the air came and devoured it. The Kookees also adore the Devil; being aware of his propensity to do harm, they appease him with offerings of fowls, &c. They recognise two distinct future states, one on the top of a very high hill from whence can be surveyed all the beauties of nature, and to entitle them to enjoy its happiness they present to the guardian angel of the mountain, the heads of monkeys, deer, hogs and of other animals which they have slain in their hunting excursions. For this reason they preserve with such care the heads of the animals which I have seen in their houses; but if a person has not the good fortune to possess one of those heads, he is sent to hell, as good for nothing. Asking them, if they who had committed murder, theft, &c. would be admitted to the happy state, by presenting heads to the Angel, they appeared quite ignorant of the subject. Concerning marriage, the young man is obliged to give the relations of the girl a wild cow or 50 rupees. In case of divorce, when the woman wishes to separate, she must return he husband the dowry he had given, but, if the husband send her away, he has no claim. Should the woman be guilty of adultery, her seducer must pay the husband the original dowry. In all cases of divorce the children, male and female, remain with the father. A person guilty of robbery is sentenced by the head of the village to pay to the party whom he has robbed, double the amount stolen. When a doctor cannot cure his patient by the medicines known to him, he concludes that the sick person is in the power of the Devil, who is then propitiated by the usual offerings. When a person dies, the Kookees have different ways of disposing of the corpse. In some Villages, they perforate the belly in different places, and then, placing the body over a fire, they continue turning it, till all the humours are wasted and the flesh becomes perfectly hardened. They preserve it in this state, in the house for one year. In other Villages, they hollow the trunk of a tree and place the body inside, fencing the place, to prevent the wild beasts from approaching it. One year after death, they erect a shed close to the place where the body is preserved, and there the relations and friends of the deceased, assemble to lament, sing and dance, for the space of four days, after which they remove the bones to the summit of a hill, where are deposited the remains of those of the same tribe; taking with them, the arms, gold, silver, clothes and every article which belonged to the deceased, with the heads of the animals he has slain during life; even his dearest friends do not appropriate to themselves, the most trifling article. All is left there and even the most daring robber would not venture to touch them.*

Every one acquainted with the customs of the Burmese and Karians will immediately recognise them in the usages of the Kookees. The practice of preserving the heads of animals is common to the adjacent tribes in the Birnan empire. The Karians keep not only the heads of animals, but even of persons whom they have conquered in war. A person having an hundred heads of men and animals is entitled to become the chief of the tribe. The Karians adopt the same custom. The Dicks, a savage tribe living in the interior of Borneo, preserve with scrupulous care the heads of persons slain by them; and when a young man applies for a wife, the first question demanded, is, "how many heads he possesses?" Should the number be less than half of those in her father's possession, he must return to the wars and add to his stock, when his application will be successful.

I showed the Kookees a specimen of coal and asked them, had they ever seen the like? They said that they had frequently observed such in the hills, but not knowing its use, they gave it no particular attention. Should the Government, however, encourage them, I think that these people would indicate the particular localities where it may be found, and perhaps in large quantities.†

The Kookees of the Village I had visited are an independent tribe, but they usually take the ivory which they procure to the Bomangee, or chief of the Mugs. The other Kookees have their Rajah, but I cannot say how far his authority extends.

Last year, during my trip, I ascertained that two species of dogs were seen in the hills. The smaller has pointed and straight ears. They roam in packs from 15 to 20 in number. This species is common on the Tenasserim coast. The other species is much larger, and they are never seen more than two or three together. The Mugs and the Shammah assured me that they have long and pendant ears. The Kookees having given me the same description, I can have no doubt, that there is a new species of dog, as yet unknown to naturalists. I was also told on the Tenasserim coast, that a large species of dog is seen there of a dark brown colour; but as it never occurred to me, to inquire what was the size and shape of the ears, I cannot say if the species be similar to that of the Kookee district.

The people living on the hills at the foot of which runs the Chittagong river are the Daino, Shamma, Langat, Shiamdu, Benzoo and Rian.

The above is a brief account of the customs and character of the Kookees. I would have gone to see them sooner, but that in my trip of last year, the inhabitants of a Village I had visited, told me, that it was unsafe to go among the Kookees who might take me to be an English spy and treat me accordingly. How little did they know of their disposition?

My Lord,

I have the honor to be,

With sentiments of respect and esteem,

Your Grace's most obedient servant,

J. BARBE.

* The Karians have a custom, like the Kookees, of disposing of their dead, but they burn the whole body to ashes with the exception of one bone, which they preserve for a year, and then, after a feast of several days, they dispose of it with the property of the deceased in the same fashion as the Kookees.

† Coal would be of little use unless found near water carriage.

Mr. Barbe, is probably the first European who has been allowed peaceably and quietly to enter these hills. I have seen a few instances of Officers having crossed from the Sylhet district into Assam, but they encountered great opposition from the Kookees and Wagas. Mr. B. might visit them every year and cultivate their friendship. He would soon become acquainted with their language and acquire an influence with them which officers of Government never could attain. He should allow the season to be a little more advanced before starting and not leave Chittagong before the end of October, when the journey would be attended with less risk.

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

J. Piaggio and Associates, through His Grace the Archbishop, for Sept. and Oct. last.

A CERTAIN METHOD OF FINDING OUT THE TRUE RELIGION.

To the Rev. Henry Fritter.

Rev. Sir,—My object in writing you this letter is, to convince you by solid reasons that the Protestant church is not the true church of Christ, and that, therefore, it is your bounden duty to seek out this true church, and to join its communion. I purpose, therefore, laying before you some hasty reflections, which may be of service to you in fixing your ideas on this most important point. Let Protestants who really, with an humble and contrite heart, seek the truth ask themselves this question,—Have we done well in forsaking the church which Jesus Christ has himself established, of which the apostles were the first pastors, for which so many martyrs have shed their blood, of which the holy fathers have been her instructors, and of which so many saints have been her ornaments? It is impossible but that they must have some doubts in regard to the legality of so extraordinary a separation; for in a question like this the point to be found out is, if they have acted well in separating themselves from the Catholic church, it suffices to doubt if this separation were lawful, in order to return to the unity of the church, because the very doubt creates a prejudice in favour of the Catholic church, therefore sufficient and convincing reasons must be shown for separating from it. Now permit me here to remark, that the generality of Protestants have not the ways and means, such as ability, industry, &c. to enter into a full examination of all the controverted points, they must have read all the fathers, all the councils, &c. and have examined all the works with their own eyes, which is a thing impossible for the generality of mankind to do. To whom, then, must they have recourse? It must be to their parsons. But permit me to ask, why do they place more confidence in a small number of men, who, in fact, are nothing more or less than elders, than in all the fathers of the church, general councils, &c.? Why have they recourse to these men of yesterday, who teach them to confide in no one, telling them that they themselves acknowledge no authority? Now, in this perplexity, would it not be a safer way to have recourse to a more ancient church, and whose authority is the most incontestible under the heavens, rather than to a few parsons, who can show no earthly title why they should be believed? Protestantism is built upon private judgment, and therefore allows a man to think and judge for himself. Upon this their own principle, therefore, how can they blame the Arian for denying the divinity of Christ? for he will tell them with triumph that, according to their own principle of every man explaining the scriptures as he pleases, he, therefore (an Arian), has the same right to deny the divinity of Christ, as you (a Protestant), have to deny transubstantiation; from all which I conclude that Protestantism must naturally lead to infidelity. Also, if every man be allowed to judge for himself; what use have we for a most expensive church establishment of archbishops, bishops, deans, &c.? Therefore, all that is required, according to Protestant principles, is to read the scriptures, and to interpret them as, you please; but, till then, how will they prove the inspiration and canonicity of the sacred volume? I defy them to prove it except on the authority of the Catholic church. Protestants who really seek the truth ought to reflect well that nothing is more absurd than not to submit to any sort of authority, because it is the system of their sect. Here ask them from whom have they received their authority, which they wish to arrogate to themselves of being the judges of what the Catholic church teaches? What right have they to judge the doctrine of the Christians of all ages? So further, because Jesus Christ himself declared, in terms the most clear, that he who will not leave the church is an infidel. How can they, therefore, without the greatest impiety, trample the divine command of the Saviour under their feet and presume to recommend mankind to despise all that is great and venerable in the church of eighteen centuries and upwards?

If I am asked, to whom a person seeking the truth should have recourse to for the true interpretation of the scriptures? I reply, if he goes to a person he will give him his own private interpretation on the point, as he is authorized to do by Protestantism; therefore, his own opinion is probably just as sound as the parson's, and who him moreover, may be a very ignorant man; but he go to the Catholic and apostolic church, who have ever rightly explained the sacred scriptures since the days of the apostles, and who has secured without interruption the Holy Spirit and the light of Jesus Christ, to explain them properly and to understand them. It is from this church that Protestants have separated; it is from this church that Protestants have received the apostle's creed, the knowledge of the great mystery of the Trinity, and the Incarnation. It is by her that they are Christians; it is by her they know the necessity of baptism, and the knowledge of Jesus Christ, his actions, his miracles, and his doctrines. How, therefore, can Protestants presume to arrogate that which has been confined only to his church by Jesus Christ?

I am, Sir,

Your obedient Servant,

ZETA.

P. S. I answer your question as follows: Does not the Greek church, do not all the churches which separated from the church of Rome before the reformation, invoke the Virgin Mary, the other saints, and the angels? Does not Martin Luther exclaim, "Who can deny that God works great miracles at the tombs of his saints?" I therefore, with the whole Catholic church, hold that the saints are to be honoured and invoked by us. Let no one omit to call on the Blessed Virgin, the angels and saints, that they may intercede for him at the hour of his death."—In his Letter to Spalatinus, and in his Treatise de Purgat., and in Præpar. ad Mortem Vogt. (Rheinische Geschichte und Sagen.) Add the example of Schlegel, Schiller, Arndt, Fouquet and Goethe, to which list of illustrious names might be added from our own nation.

ON THE USE OF THE BIBLE.

XII. I once knew an individual, a man of distinguished talents, and enjoying a high degree of reputation in the world, and who,—without having indulged in any of the grosser vices, had till lived in a great forgetfulness of God,—ought, at length, to find consolation in his infirmities, by having recourse to religion. He, however, repeatedly assured me, that the reading of the Bible, so far from yielding him any benefit, had served only to awaken in his mind uneasiness and scandal. The reason, no doubt, of this was his own proud spirit,—presumptuous, and full of certain prejudices, which indisposed him for the otherwise salutary study. The case, however, is by no means an uncommon one. There are multitudes, unhappily, who have been and are now everywhere in the self-same state of indisposition. I have even known men, who, when they were engaged to read such passages of the Scriptures, as the following—that the serpent spoke to Eve to seduce her;—that an ass spoke to the Prophet Balaam;—that Nebuchadnezzar fed upon grass, like the beasts;—were tempted to imagine, that we were amusing them with childish tales. Saint Austin was aware and sensibly felt it,—that many readers would at first be astonished at the number of the wives of the Patriarchs: and he, therefore, thought it necessary to point out in considerable detail the circumstances and causes which justified their conduct. We all, in like manner, know, what pains the same holy Father has taken to prove that Jacob was not a liar; and that he had not deceived his Father, in order to deprive his elder brother of the principal blessing. I have known a man of talents, indignant and scandalised, at the idea of seeing a nation, which boasted of being conducted by the hand of God, going out of Egypt, carrying away with them the riches of the Egyptians; rebelling in the desert against Moses;—adoring a golden calf; and, ere long, making use of their heavenly mission, in seizing upon the lands of the neighbouring people and murdering them, in order to get possession of their place,—when, mean while, they were not one jot less corrupted than the latter. With these impressions upon his mind, it became necessary for me to refute minutely and one by one all his objections, in order thus to repress his spirit of criticism and incredulity. I have also, known other individuals, who were scandalised at David: because they observed, he recommended it to his son, when he was actually dying to take that revenge which he had not himself taken during his life-time. It must again be owned, that the ordinary classes of society,—the ignorant and the illiterate,—whose reason is not sufficiently disciplined and subdued to the authority of the sacred books,—are surprised not unfrequently at seeing the Prophets commit I know not how many actions, which appear both indecent and absurd.

It is true,—These extraordinary things and actions are mysterious and extraordinarily inspired. It is true, that they teach us truths, which are profoundly deep. But, here the question is:—Are the generality of men,—men without humility, or virtue,—capable of bearing with such examples? Is it not rather to be feared, that they would abuse them? When men are not accustomed to these deep mysteries, how easy and natural, it is for them to be astonished to behold Abraham, preparing to sacrifice his only son,—a son, too, whom God had miraculously given to him, with a promise, at the same time, that the posterity of the interesting child should, one day, prove the blessing of the universe? The surprise of such an unenlightened individual is, in like manner perhaps equally great, in seeing Jacob,—prompted by the counsel of his inspired mother,—appearing to act the part of an impostor;—or in seeing Osce, by the command of God, take for his wife such a woman as he did. Where men are incredulous and corrupted they wonder how Job can be proposed to them as a model of patience,—a man who curses the day of his nativity; who boasts of never having deserved the sufferings which he undergoes; who, in the excess of his anguish,—after rejecting every consolation, suggested to him by his friends, who piously exhorted him to own himself a sinner,—appears even to murmur against God himself. Thus, too, nothing is more difficult to explain, than how Judith,—whom the Holy Ghost proposes to us for our admiration,—could have gone to find out Holofernes. She tempted him to sin, says the libertine, and she then deceived and murdered him. In the case of the Canticle of Canticles, there is not in the whole series of this book one single word either regarding God or concerning virtue. On the contrary, the letter itself presents nothing but the images of sensual love;—images, which, unless the heart be purified, are calculated to make upon it the most dangerous impressions. It is true, indeed, that, where the eye is enlightened by faith, and the heart has a relish for divine love,—the individual thus favoured, finds in it a beautiful allegory, expressive of the union of the pure soul with God. But, then, how few are the individuals, who are thus so happily renewed in Jesus Christ, as to enter fully into this mystery of the sacred nuptials of the bride with the heavenly bridegroom?—If we were to stop at the bare letter of the book of the Ecclesiast, we might be tempted to imagine, that his reasonings are the arguments of some unbeliever, who considers everything here, as nought but vanity, because man wholly dies exactly like the beast. The books of the Maccabees exhibit to us a people, shaking off the yoke of the kings of Syria, and taking up arms, in order to exercise their religion with freedom, rather than suffer martyrdom like the first Christians, who endured every kind of persecution, without ever revolting against their emperors. A great number of the early Christians, by reading in the Apocalypse the account of the reign of a thousand years, fell into the errors of the Millenarians: and St. Austin owns, that himself, for a time, was seduced by the false opinions of the moderate Millenarians.

It is so, too, with multitudes of Protestants. Misled by prejudices and bigotry, the number among these is immense, who pitifully believe that Catholic Rome is still that Babylon, which worships idols,—because its members respect the images and invoke the prayers, of the Saints. So, too, do they equally believe, that “She is drunk with the blood of Martyrs,” because, forsooth, she once persecuted the Reformers!—I have, myself, known persons, who were struck with the splendour of the purple, or the scarlet, of this Babylon; and whom it was difficult to persuade, that, in the aforesaid descriptions, it was the design of St. John to paint Pagan Rome which, during the course of three hundred years, persevered in the persecution of the Christian Church. Wherever men are actuated by prejudices, like the above, they believe, and pretend to prove, from the Epistle to the Romans, that God hates and damns the greater part of mankind, without any demerit on their part to determine him to such acts. These same individuals,—half Protestants,—when they read the words—“God gives, both to will, and to do,”—at once conclude, that, therefore, He does so by the power of a “necessitating grace,”—they have recourse to a variety of empty, but artful, subtleties,—alleging, for example, that the will cannot reject such grace, when presented; because it is necessary to follow its delightful, but inevitable and invincible, impulse.

The Socinians, who in our days are become so numerous and withal so dangerous, employ the Scriptures to show, that Christ Jesus has declared, that He willed not to be considered, as God, save in that same improper, and allegorical, sense, in which it is said to men,—“You are Gods,”—and still further, that He has declared in express terms—“My Father is greater than I am.”—The Protestants pretend to prove, from the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians, as well as from that to the Hebrews, that faith alone, without works, suffices for salvation;—although works they say, follow from faith. They pretend to show, from the Epistle to the Hebrews, that, under the new law, there can be but one victim, one sacrifice, and one only offering, which has no need of being, any more, or again, repeated; because it is not like that of the victims of the Jews. Saint John appears to the Protestants to authorise in his Epistles the impeccability of those who are “the seed of God.” There are others, who trace in his words the principles of fanaticism, when he says, that “it is the Spirit, that teaches all things.” Saint Paul, they add, confirms the same maxim,—declaring, that “the spiritual man judges of all things, and is judged, himself, by no one.”

Where men experience a disposition to incredulity, they are sure to criticise and quibble on the apparent contradictions which are found in the different editions of the Scriptures, in relation to the subject of chronology. They perplex themselves, in the like manner, respecting the genealogy of Jesus Christ, which, in one of the Evangelists, is given, they assert, very differently by another.—They are scandalised at our Saviour saying, “I go not up to this festival,”—whilst yet, he, soon after, went there secretly. They say:—He is, sometimes frightened, sometimes troubled, that he prays to the Father to deliver him from his passion, and that, in short, He complains, on the cross, that He is forsaken by Him. To all these various objections, they add, that the disciples of Christ are unable to agree among themselves;—that St. Paul reproaches Peter with his face, and that he cannot agree with St. Barnaby.

After considering the above difficulties, and objections, it cannot but be owned, that if at one book of piety, such, for example, as the Following of Christ, the Spiritual Combat or the Sinner's Guide, contained one hundredth part of the difficulties, that are found in the Bible, you would consider yourself bound in conscience to forbid its being read in your Lordship's diocese. Not the excellence of the book would prevent you from concluding, that it would be wrong to place it indifferently in the hands of all,—of the profane, the curious and the ignorant—because such food, although excellent, would be too powerful for them and they too feeble to digest it. The Scripture, like Christ Jesus himself “has been given for the ruin and the resurrection of many.” Like Him, “it is exposed to the contradiction of multitudes in Israel.” The self same word, which is a bread, that nourishes some is a sword, that pierces the souls of others. It is an odour of life to such as live by faith, and who die to themselves sincerely. It is an odour of death to such as are estranged from the way of God, and who are wrapped up in themselves by self-complacency and pride. To disorder stomachs, the very best food turns to poison. Whosoever seeks for subjects of scandal,—although it be in the Word of God itself,—is sure to find it there for his ruin. So nicely has the wisdom of God tempered the degrees of light and shade, in his sacred Word, that all such as are humble, docile and sincere, find in it only truth and consolation; whilst such as are presumptuous and indocile, find nothing in it but error and incredulity. All those difficulties, which I have been giving the examples, disappear and vanish;—and this, too, without any trouble, soon as ever the mind is once cured of its presumption. “Then,” according to that rule of St. Austin, “we pass over what we do not understand; and we are edified with all that we do understand.”

Where men sincerely and piously believe that the Word of God is deeply mysterious, and therefore impenetrable to our feeble reason,—they, in this case, listen with docility to their pastors, explaining and justifying such passages of the sacred text, as are difficult and perplexing;—they turn their whole attention toward those principles, which serve, as a key, to the truth; they are diffident in themselves; and even timidly careful not to indulge too far, either their curiosity, or their reasonings. Awed by the depth of the mysterious volume, they suffer themselves rather to be judged by it, than themselves to judge it. They read it, under the guidance of their pastors, or of their prudent and experienced directors; and they read it, also in the spirit of the Church itself. Conducted by the same maxims of Christian wisdom, they pray, still more than they read; whilst, again when they do so in the spirit of prayer,—convinced, that prayer, beyond every other principle best opens to us the knowledge of the truth. “When the mind,” says Cassian, “is sensible of its own poverty, —which is the first of the beatitudes,—it then penetrates the sense of the Sacred Scriptures, less by the reading of the text, than by the experience of its own inability. Then the holy volume unfolds itself more clearly; and its reins communicate its marrow; because then we become like the authors of the text; and we enter into the spirit of him, who composed it."

XIII. It was from the consideration of the difficulties, such as those, which I have stated, that St. Austin has declared, that "nothing is more properly denominated the death of the soul, than the servile adherence to the letter of the text." He remarks, still farther, that, "if, in the Scriptures, there are persons praised, who did certain actions, repugnant to the ways and manners of the virtuous, who, since the coming of Christ, observe the divine commandments,—we, in this case, ought to understand these things in a figurative sense; and not apply them to the customs of the present times; for many things which were anciently under the old law, done officially, could now no longer be done but by the impulse of the passions." At the same time, the Saint remarks, that "the figurative sense, which a prophet had principally in view, so that his narrative of the past is a figure of the future,—this," the Saint allows, "ought not to be proposed to such as are contentious, and unbelievers." He merely maintains that the Scriptures "present to the pious Christian abundant reasons not rashly to criticise its divine authority;—whilst the Marcionites, the Manichees, and other heretics, inspired by the devil, seek in them,—in points, which they are incapable of penetrating,—only vain pretexts for calumny and scandal." The rule which this enlightened Father proposes for the reading of the sacred text, is remarkable. "Be the doubt," he says, "what it may, that arises in the mind of an individual, whilst reading the Word of God, let him not, hence, abandon his Saviour, Jesus Christ: let him feel that he understands nothing, until this divine being is revealed to him in his words. Neither let him presume to believe, that he has penetrated the sense of these, until he is so far happily advanced, as to have found in them Christ Jesus himself." It is, no doubt, true, that to penetrate in this manner the mysterious meaning of many passages of the Bible, is a subject far surpassing the talents and acquirements of the ignorant and the indocile. For this reason, the same holy Father adds: "God presents many grand spectacles to the Christian and pious heart: and nothing can be more delicious,—provided only that men possess that palate of faith, which relishes the honey of God." Hence, therefore, every thing depends upon the dispositions of the heart. This once well prepared, the impenetrable depths of the sacred text present nothing hidden to the mind, that is humble, simple and sincere. "The heart," says again St. Austin "that is full of charity, understands, without either error or labour the overflowing abundance, both of the divinity and of the surpassing doctrine of the Scriptures." And he cites the following simple and decisive reason: It is this,—"that the man who possesses charity, possesses also, at the same time, both what is clear and what is hidden in the sacred text." The Saint still farther requires, that the Faithful when they read the Scriptures and are unable to penetrate the meaning of any text,—"shall still, at all events, honour it, and reserve for it in their breasts the sentiments of reverence and fear." As, however, there are dispositions, which are very rarely to be met with,—so, also, does it very rarely happen, that men are properly prepared to read the sacred pages with real benefit. "All the divine Scriptures," he says, "are salutary to such as understand them rightly. But they are dangerous to those who strive to distort them to the accommodation of their own corrupted hearts;—whereas, they ought to accommodate their hearts to the sanctity of the text."

The great principle of St. Austin, which he lays down in his book, De Utilitate Credendi,—a system so flattering to self-love,—that knowledge ought to precede faith. On the contrary, he contends, that the real order of religion is, to begin by humbly believing, under the guidance of authority, in order thus, ere long, to acquire knowledge. It was, therefore, his wish and plan, that men should read the Scriptures in a spirit of unreserved docility. We must, also, remark, that it was his opinion, that the study and understanding of the Scriptures should proceed gradually,—that is, in proportion to the simplicity, the humility and the conquest over self-love, which each one may have obtained. "In tantum videtur," he says, "in quantum moriuntur huic seculo. In quantum, autem, huic vivunt, non videtur." According to this holy Doctor, the most learned divine, who thinks that he understands the Scriptures, without tracing in them every where a system "of Charity," has not, as yet, understood them,—"nondum intellexit." On the contrary, he says, as we have seen already:—

The man, who is led and supported by faith, hope and charity, does not stand in need of the Scriptures, except for the purpose of instructing others. And thus it is, that among the holy solitaries, there are many, who live in the deserts, supported and sanctified by these three virtues alone, without any of the sacred books." The circumstance is not to be wondered at, observes the Saint,—for this reason: "Although the most holy pastors of the Church, or the very angels themselves, labour to instruct, yet would no one learn well, what he ought to know, in order to live with God, unless God renders him docile to God himself. Thus it is, that the aid of instructions, administered by men, becomes useful to the soul, when God himself interferes and operates to render them useful."

XIV. It may, perhaps, be observed, my Lord, that the Books of the Scripture are the same now, that they were in the early ages;—that Bishops, by their ministry, possess the same authority, and that the Faithful ought always to be fed with the same bread. It is true: the Books of the Scripture are the same; but, in all other regards, the state and circumstances of men are altered. Men now, who bear the name of Christians, possess no longer that same simplicity and teachableness,—that same preparation of heart and mind, which distinguished the ancient Faithful. An immense portion of the Christian world are now little else than Christians, by their baptism received in their infancy, without either any knowledge, or any voluntary engagement. They do not indeed venture to retract their promises, lest the profaneness of such act should excite the horror of the public. They are even too indolent and indifferent on the subject of religion, to trouble themselves about such renunciation. At the same time, they would be delighted, if, without any difficulty they could find out in the sacred pages, arguments to shake off the yoke and to flatter their passions. Hardly can such men be looked upon as Catechumens. The Catechumens, who, anciently, were wont to prepare themselves for martyrdom, whilst, at the same time, they were fitting themselves for baptism, were infinitely superior to those Christians, who bear the name of Christians only to profane it. On the other hand, the Pastors of the Faithful no longer now possess that influence and authority, which the ancient priesthood wisely employed with so much gentleness and force. So much is the veneration for the episcopal authority now diminished, that hardly does a vestige of it remain impressed upon the hearts of the public. Whence also, our order now possesses no longer that paternal influence, which is so essential to inspire that spirit of humble docility and piety, which is required for the beneficial reading of the sacred books. In these days, all men are casuists, doctors of divinity—deciding each one for himself—defending the cause of novelty; and, under the most frivolous pretexts, rejecting the authority of the Church. They dispute and quibble about words, without which the sense is an empty phantom. In short, criticism is now carried to the utmost degree of rashness—drying up the heart;—exalting reason above its sphere,—inculcating a contempt for simple and interior piety;—and rendering men, not Christians, but philosophers. Even their piety,—where they have any,—is rather a dry and presumptuous study, than a life of recollection and humility. In fact, such are the darings and conduct of these men, that, did not the promises of God support my confidence, I should tremble for the speedy overthrow of his Church. Those days are now come, “when men will not endure sound doctrine—but have itching ears,”—listening to the voice of every artful innovator.

Wherefore, from these considerations, I conclude, that, under such circumstances, it would be highly dangerous to intrust the sacred pages, indifferently, and without any restriction, to the rash criticisms of the public. The great measure should, first, be, to re-establish an order of mild and paternal authority; and to instruct the Faithful well in the Scriptures, before they undertake to read them. They ought, too, to be gradually prepared for this;—so that when they do come to consult the sacred text, they may be already accustomed to understand it; and be filled with the spirit, before they advance to the letter. And neither ought the reading of the divine book to be permitted, except to such as are simple, docile, and humble,—to persons, who in reading it, seek not to gratify their curiosity,—not to dispute and criticise,—but to nourish their piety, and to instruct themselves in silence. In short, the Scriptures should be given to those alone, who, receiving them from the hands of the Church, seek in them only the sense of the Church.

PROPOSED FEVER HOSPITAL, IN CONNECTION WITH THE MEDICAL COLLEGE.

“The population of Calcutta,” says, Dr. Vos, “is increasing so much, that there is an immediate want of an Hospital for poor Hindoo-Britons and, poor Roman Catholics. I have continually poor Christians in the Police Hospital.”

“A Lying-in Asylum for Christian and Native women would also be a great acquisition, for I am convinced that many, in small huts, and filthy places, die for want of proper room and care, being very poor, but not quite destitute.”

In the Observations by Ramecomul Sein and Dr. Jackson it is said, that “there are no Institutions which are of adequate service to the immense number of poor, homeless and helpless Native inhabitants and emigrants, in and about the Town of Calcutta. It may be said that there is a Native Hospital and two public Dispensaries, but the people do not generally avail themselves of the benefit of these Institutions.” “The Dispensaries supply medicines to such persons as are able to attend personally, and to show themselves to the superintending Surgeon or Apothecary; but, if the dose of Medicine they receive does not produce the expected relief, or operates with any degree of violence or if their illness increases, they do not present themselves again, or apply for more medicines, and nothing more is known of their history. Indeed there are many who receive medicine from the Dispensaries, but do not take it at all. The Native Hospital is well calculated, and was originally established, for patients labouring under external, or accidental injuries, such as are constantly sent by the Police; but people affected with fever, or other diseases, of whom great numbers die annually, derive hardly any benefit from it.”

Your Committee will presently have occasion to shew that this must be taken to mean, not that the Native Hospital confers no benefit on persons afflicted with fever, and other diseases requiring Medical treatment, but that this is not the object of its establishment; and that its power of receiving patients of this description, though exercised at the expense of a considerable diminution of its efficiency in discharging its duties as a Surgical Institution, is miserably inadequate to the purpose.

It appears from Mr. Martin’s explanatory Note that the usefulness of the Native Hospital as a Surgical Institution, is impeded by the necessity existing at present, from the want of an Hospital for Medical cases, of admitting into it cases of fever and dysentery, and that there is this disadvantage in mixing the two classes of Native patients—that the Medical patients are often frightened away before their cure is completed, by viewing the cases of severe wounds, accidents and operations, common to a Surgical Institution, like the Native Hospital. “This,” he says, “very frequently happens to us.”

It is stated, in the observations above referred to of Baboo Ramecomul Sein and Doctor Jackson, that, besides the multitude of resident inhabitants destitute of Medical aid, except from Dispensaries, "people from various parts of Bengal come to Calcutta to seek for employment, to beg charity and assistance from their friends and acquaintance and for speculations. They come and live with persons who are employed in offices, and workmen, and those who follow menial professions and whose means are very limited. If they are able, or willing, to live separately, they hire lodgings in some hut or old building, the small apartments of which are let from two annas to two rupees a month. These people do not possess a sufficient quantity of clothing; they are naked almost day and night; they have no bed, and lie down on mats and leaves spread on the damp ground in their cells or holes. In hot weather they sleep out in open places, and on the borders of the road, exposed to the weather, and all its changes."

"When they get fever or cholera, they have nobody to attend on them, nor have they any means to procure Medical aid, clothing, or food suitable to the state of their health. If it is fever, it increases, and becomes violent day by day; many cannot afford to buy even a dose of Panchun (the commonest and cheapest Native remedy) which costs but one pyce; and, even if the people of the house, or their neighbours, give them pyce enough to purchase it, they have neither place nor means to prepare it; and, destitute of all the comforts and necessities of life, their illnesses soon arrive at a stage, always dangerous, in which their recovery must be generally considered doubtful, while they are, without any care and attention being paid to them, exposed to the vicissitudes of atmosphere, with nothing but unwholesome water for drink. The friends of the miserable being with whom he lives, or at whose place he hires his lodging, finding his case bad, become alarmed, send for a Byda (Native Doctor) to prescribe for him. But the landlord or host now becomes involved in another difficulty: he cannot attend himself to the sick, and neither has, nor can give means to take proper care of him, and, therefore, to get rid of his sick tenant or guest these are the modes usually resorted to. He procures him either a boat or dooly to carry him to his family in the country, which he never, or at least seldom, reaches. By the shaking and agitation he receives in his weak state, exposed to the weather, he soon dies. "I have seen," says Mr. Jackson, "boatmen and bearers often put down such men on the ghauts and bank of the River, &c. where in a few hours they have expired, or they are often attacked by beasts of prey before they cease to breathe." The second, and more convenient mode adopted in Calcutta for disposing of such a man, is to carry him to the bank of the River, and there to place him under the charge of some hired people at the ghaut of the River waiting his dissolution."

"This mode is considered more convenient and less expensive and better for the deceased as well as the persons to whom he was attached. Another reason for this also is the well known Hindoo belief, that, when a sick man considers that he has no hope left of being recovered, he had better die by the holy stream. Allowing the sick to die in his cell, and throwing his body into the stream, is reckoned infamous, and disgraceful to the survivors and friends of the deceased, and cruel and unbecoming in the persons with whom he has lived. But if he dies on the bank of the Ganges there is some consolation for his family and friends, and at the same time it saves the landlord or his host from the reproaches, which might otherwise be poured upon him by the friends."

"It is to these circumstances that the Unter-jalie, or ghaut murder, owes its derivation, about which so much has of late been said in the Calcutta papers."

* * * * *

"Mr. F. H. Brett, Surgeon to the Governor-General's Body Guard, states that early attention to their attacks by means of a well regulated Hospital, united to good Drainage and Ventilation, would go far to prevent decidedly in his opinion, even in the climate of Calcutta the recurrence of dysenteries, remittent and intermittent fevers, affections of the spleen, and rheumatism, which constituted 265 out of 401 Medical cases received into his Hospital.

"For want of such a receptacle," he says, "numbers of the labouring classes and their families, although their diseases are at first of a slight nature, perish—a vast majority of those attacked perish for want of prompt attention, from exposure and destitution of the comforts, and in many cases, the necessities of life. The great majority of the cases are at first of a slight nature, and would be capable of easy cure by proper Medical assistance."

"He is of opinion that Dispensaries, in whatever number established, would not meet the evil arising from the want of Medical assistance. The reasons are, that the diseases cannot be watched; and if the first dose is not successful the patients lose their confidence."

* * * * *

"In Dr. Stewart's Paper transmitted to the Committee, he expresses himself with regard to the proposed Fever Hospital and the Medical necessities of the poor in Calcutta and its Suburbs, as follows: "With regard to the proposed Fever Hospital. I am anxious to record my opinion, though but that of an individual, of the urgent duty and necessity existing for such an Institution; to testify also to the high value and estimation which the Native poor will set upon it, and to point out the extensive good, which, in various ways may be expected to follow. Of the first, no one can doubt who has beheld the thousand poor and famished and diseased objects who collect round a rich man's door, when his intention to distribute alms has been announced; or who has ever ventured to visit the haunts of misery and filth and sickness where these poor wretches retreat to die, "insensible to mortality and desperately mortal."

"Of the eagerness with which thousands will avail themselves of the boons thus charitably offered—of shelter, of food, and of medicine—no one the least acquainted with human nature will doubt; but it is well to state that the Natives, both rich and poor, have an extravagant opinion of European Medical skill, and a confidence in it only equal to their submission to the will of heaven."—(To be continued.)

THE SECULARITY OF MISSIONS.

The secularizing influence of property and organization for despatch of business is not confined to Established Churches. The purest Voluntary Church cannot escape it; the Missions to the Heathen bear witness to its influence. Wherever there is permanent organization—an annual revenue and annual expenditure—a separate class of secular agents grow up; and they, and sometimes others of ostensibly spiritual functions, combine to instil a worldly spirit into the whole body, or at least to make the spiritually minded unconsciously more or less subservient to their selfish objects.

The difficulty which the Missionary Societies have had to struggle against the land sharking propensities of their Ministers and catechists in the Colonies, and the occasional dismissal of the spiritual character by Missionaries rather than part with the lands they had purchased from the natives at a nominal price, prove our position to a certain extent. But the readiness with which Missionary agents exchange their pastoral for diplomatic functions affords a still more striking illustration of it. At this moment we have no fewer than three Government officials abroad to whom the Missionary character has been a stepping-stone to political employment. The missionary Gutzlaff has been converted into a Government interpreter, and quasi Superintendent of Police, at Hong kong; the Missionary Pritchard has been converted into a British Consul at Otaheite; and the Missionary Clarke has been constituted Protector of the Aborigines, or Minister of State for the native department, in New Zealand. The elevation of a foreign adventurer and a couple of mechanics to official rank and high salaries is enough to attract a whole host of mercenaries into the employment of the Mission. They will look forward to the same opportunities of cutting out work for themselves, and the same zealous patronage from the managers at home, and regard the appointment of catechist as a better introduction to snug place under Government than even a clerkship in a Government office.

It leaves an unfavourable impression of Missions as a school of diplomacy, that all the appointments above enumerated have been productive of, or at least mixed up with, transactions which have occasioned much annoyance to individuals and serious embarrassment to the country. Gutzlaff has been more or less identified with almost every step that awakened the jealousy of the Chinese Government and led eventually to the Opium War; Clarke has been mainly instrumental in producing that state of affairs in New Zealand which occasioned the Wairao massacre; and it will not be the fault of the orators of the London Missionary Society if Pritchard does not become the cause of war between France and Great Britain.

For the political influence and misdirected activity of the Missionary bodies Government is greatly to blame. The meddling of Missionaries abroad in matters beyond their sphere has been encouraged to supply the deficiencies of Government. The power of affiliated bodies spread through every province of the empire, continually appealing to the prepossessions of an estimable portion of the community by the press or public meetings, collecting and dispensing annually revenues to the amount of hundreds of thousands, has made the Legislature and the executive quail before it. Missionary zeal has been affected as a passport into Parliament; and the Government offices have been crammed with the offspring of the agent of Missionary Societies. Government—all our Ministers for many years back—have been little better than tools to the secularity of Missions.

The influence of the traders on the Missionary sentiment is not confined to the departments already specified; or rather, they are naturally leagued with all the traders, whatever their designation, on the religious sentiment of the country. They are part and parcel of that fraternity which has been allowed almost to ruin our Tropical Colonies by their rash and blundering plan of Negro Emancipation, and which only last year caused the rejection of the Education clauses in the Factory Bill. They are, in fact, an intriguing worldly-minded hierarchy, as bigoted and domineering in their sectarianism as the Romish hierarchy in its palmiest days.

The eyes of the public are opening to its real character. The war-howl raised by the Missionaries at Leeds and Finsbury, and this week at Exeter Hall, will assist the unmasking. The usual oratorical device of prefacing warlike appeals by professions of a love for peace was resorted to; but war was the undisguised alternative of all the speakers—an armed intervention between France and Otaheite—a war to arrest the progress of Roman Catholic Missionaries in the Pacific.

These revelations of the real character of the traders upon religious professions ought to encourage Government, as its experience of the danger of giving way to them ought to instigate it, to shake off their yoke. Within his proper sphere, there cannot be a more amiable or useful character than the Missionary. It may not be possible for him to make Christians of savages, to the extent his enthusiasm persuades him: but, by habituating them to the observance of forms, and by familiarizing them with doctrines and histories in which there is a pure and elevating sentiment, which will dawn more and more upon every succeeding generation, he is sowing the seeds of a civilization the full fruition of which is reserved for a distant æra, and at the same time he is taming the savage, and making him a safe companion. While the Missionary confines himself to his spiritual office—be he the most illiterate mechanic never selected for the task—it is Christianity that speaks in and through him, and its influence is for good. But when he takes upon him to supersede the colonist, and to affect the state-minister of some barbarian chief, or to conduct negotiations with foreign states, he is abandoned by the Power whose altar he has deserted, to his own rude and ignorant impulses, and his meddling is pregnant with mischief. The British Government is bound to watch over and protect its Missionaries with a zealous care so long as they remain within the sphere of their proper duty; but it is equally bound sternly to check and restrain them whenever they are discovered tampering with secular affairs.—Spectator, Aug. 17.

CALCUTTA : SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1844.

[VOL. VII.]

ADDRESS TO THE MOST REV. DR. CAREW.

The following farewell address to his Grace, the most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop of Edessa, and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, from the Catholic Soldiers of H. M.'s 10th Regt. on the occasion of their departure from Calcutta, has been sent to us for publication by one of that body:—

MOST REV. SIR,—We, the Catholic Soldiers of H. M.'s 10th Regt. of Foot, beg to respectfully tender our grateful, and humble thanks to your Grace, for the unremitting attention, and kindness, evinced on the part of your Lordship, on all occasions towards us, since coming under your Grace's paternal charge, comprising a period of two years, and three months. Yes, such goodness of heart calls for a return that the humble soldiers cannot advance; however it is our overflowing hearts that speak, therefore eloquence may be silent. But, although we are soldiers, and our fleeting vicissitudes of life, so varied and changeable that it may be truly said we have no solid, or lasting commitment in our line of life: however a moment's reflection, and the thought recurs to our minds, that it would be ingratitude in us, as men and soldiers, not to acknowledge, though in humble terms it be, the unparalleled goodness of heart, and unremitting care manifested towards us since coming to Bengal. Most Rev. Sir, it would be a vain attempt in us, to endeavour to calculate the amount of gratuitous, moral and religious instruction inculcated amongst ourselves, and rising offspring, since coming under your Lordship's benign guidance and direction, on the score of our holy religion. Nothing can we adduce better for the truth of what we advance, than to state, that, under your Lordship's, and of the good Clergy of the Holy Order of Jesus, whose unabated attentions towards us has been one unceasing fount of instruction, and from thence have sprung, these unequivocal, and undeniable truths, and living testimony of what we offer.

That since our debarkation at Calcutta, in the month of August, in 1842. no fewer than from twenty-five to thirty men of our own Regiment have renounced the errors in which they had been brought up, and were regenerated in the salutary waters of baptism, embracing, with heart and hand, the all saving faith and doctrines of the One Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church of Christ. This, most Rev. Father in Christ, shows that the labour of your own hands, and those of the Rev. Messrs. Raby and Johnson, were not thrown to the wind. Now, most Rev. Sir, that we are about to depart in a day or two, and leave behind all those good Clergymen, who have, on all occasions, evinced the most warm regard on our behalf: instructing, encouraging, and admonishing, were their constant theme; and, thanks be to the Dispenser of all good gifts, these salutary instructions, thus sown amongst us, have left incontestable marks behind, that shall not, with the blessing of God, ever be obliterated from our hearts. In mentioning the names of the above Rev. Gentlemen, it would be ingratitude in us not to say, in general terms, that we are truly thankful to all the Gentlemen of St. Xavier's College, but particularly to Mr. Cooper, whose Sunday evening lessons of instruction shall never be erased from our hearts. These digressions, we hope are pardonable, when it is considered that they are the overflowing gratitude of the soldiers' hearts for favours shown towards us, and these lines, emanating from the pen of the humble, and unlettered "sons of fortune," it may not be thought strange, when we mention those that endeavour to instil instruction, and that instruction being our sole consolation on earth. The world can never say that the sin of ingratitude was ever a prominent feature in the general character of the sons of St. Patrick. In conclusion, Most Rev. Sir, we beg most respectfully to say, that it is with feelings of sincere regret we are parting, and going from out of your Lordship's diocese, where, in all probability, we will never have the pleasure of seeing either you, or the exemplary priests again. But, no matter in what part of the earth we sojourn, we shall ever remember, with sentiments of respect and gratitude, the fatherly kindness shown by your Grace, on all occasions to the Catholic Soldiers of H. M.'s 10th Regiment. As Soldiers we have nothing worthy to offer for any of the Charitable Institutions founded and patronised by your Lordship, however, like the mite of the poor widow, we have forwarded our mite through the hands of the Rev. Mr. Raby, for the Catholic Orphanage. Wishing, with all our hearts, that the blessings of the Lord may be multiplied, on our good, and venerable Archbishop, and Clergy, we humbly bid you adieu, and while the tide of life ebbs and flows in our bosoms, that bond of union shall never be severed, that has ever subsisted, between the father and children, in the Church of God: We know the arduous labours of the Catholic Missionaries of India, but such labours are passed by unnoticed, as unworthy of remark. While there are numbers to write panegyrics for a Hannibal, and a Cæsar for depopulating cities and provinces, the hard working priest of God is passed by unnoticed. O! may the Lord reward you, for works done for his honor, and glory, and the good of your fellow men, without the least remuneration, save that of his bountiful goodness, which may He unsparingly bestow on His own anointed ministers, both here and hereafter, is the prayer of your ever humble and obedient servant,

W. CARLING,

Among her passengers, are the Right Rev. Bishop Borghi, Mr. Calderani, his Secretary, Messrs. Bertrand, Marini, Bonaventura, priests; Messrs. Berniet, Baunet, Jerviers, and Gilbert, Brothers of the Order of St. Peter, and sixteen Nuns.

TALKER.—THE REV. MR. PRITCHARD.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—Some time ago, I sent you an extract from the Courier, a French Newspaper edited in London, containing the laws given to the Methodist Missionaries to the natives of Taiti—since then, a great many exaggerations, and I could use a stronger term have been made by the English press against the French authorities of that Island, particularly since the expulsion of Mr. Pritchard from Papeiti, better known on the Island by the name of Piritati. This Gentleman Methodist Missionary, had his case taken by all the sects of Protestantism, and if the English Government does not declare war against the French, it is not the fault of the pretended ministers of the God of peace. The memorable words of Dr. Wilson, speaking of Cabul, "Let us get at them," are nothing but a comparison to the spirit shown by the pious pastors. Mr. Pritchard being a merchant, has also the sympathy of the London traders, and certainly he deserves it, for the exclusive system he has adopted for the benefit of his countrymen. The Rev. gentleman merchant has yet another string to his bow. He was even Consul of Her Britannic Majesty, to Her most Gracious Majesty Queen Pomare. This last title being he is sacred by all nations, the French Government Mr. Daubigny, could not expel him without the strongest reasons: whether Piritati was a Consul, or not, at that time, is a question. Lord Aberdeen, in his answer to the Marquis of Clanricarde, seems to think that the Rev. Merchant was not, as he had lowered the British flag, when the French assumed the protectorate, and gave due notice that he had ceased to exercise his authority. If such be the case, Mr. P. must be considered in the light of only a private individual, and in that case, nobody will deny, that if I were found guilty of troubling the public peace, the local authorities had it in their power to remove him. The Times, speaking of this person, calls him "an indiscreet, headstrong man." Whether these epithets are applied to Piritati as a Missionary, Merchant, or Consul, is more than I know; or, if anything, however, is certain, that according to the recognised usages of all nations, when a Consul abuses his prerogative and conspires against the local Government, he forfeits ipso facto, all claim to the privileges of his office. We have a case in point,—during the regency of the Prince of Orleans, when the prince of Callemara, then Spanish Ambassador at the French Court, was arrested for conspiring against the Regency, the Spanish Government, the most jealous in Europe, never required either reparation or satisfaction.

We learn from the Courier de l'Europe brought by the last overland mail, some of the reasons which influenced M. Daubigny to exercise his power in sending away this is merchant. At the beginning of March, insurrection broke out in the Island,—Taiti, who was the first to protest against French protectorate, became suspected to be at the bottom of the revolution. He repented the French as a small nation who, it was true, gained some victories, having then a clever man at the head of their government, but this great Chief, having been taken prisoner, and cast into irons by the English, their time was past. He added, a large English fleet was coming out to overtake the Taitians, which would hang all the people who joined the French. The Taitians, not suspecting that a person arrogating to himself the title of minister of the French, would deceive them, armed themselves, posted up incendiary placards, and had the French taken immediate measures to suppress the insurrection, Papeiti would have been burned to ashes on the same day. M. de Bignon being too well acquainted with the character of the “indiscreet, hot-headed French,” immediately suspected him as the author of the insurrection, and, it appears, he was not mistaken, as no sooner was the Rev. Freeman arrested, than the insurrection ceased, as if by magical influence.

At the meeting which took place in the crowded sanctuary of Exeter Hall on the 1st of August, composed of Missionaries of different persuasions, Rev. Freeman, speaking of the conduct of Pomare in refusing two French Clergymen to settle at Taiti, excused the Queen, by saying that priests were spies, and wished to enslave the people. The Rev. speaker forgot to say that these two clergymen were expelled on the instigation of the Methodists. So high for his good faith! This circumstance might be ascertained by the official letter written on the 3rd of May, 1837, by Mr. de La Bourdonnaye, to Mr. Rosamel, then minister of France. Mr. Freeman excused the Queen by the following conclusive argument: “Pomare had in her kingdom as much power as Louis Philippe had in France, but Louis Philippe compels all the English travellers in France to have passports; ergo, Pomare should expel two French priests from her kingdom.” Well, undoubtedly this Rev. speaker had been favored with an indulgent audience. He is assuredly a credit to the versatility that has fledged him. His logic-reasoning is somewhat in the style of the libere vult, extinguit sitem; parvo, cum salsum facit libere. Ergo, lardum cum extinguit sitem. In the same meeting another speaker, Rev. R. W. Hamilton, dissenting minister of Leeds, summoned specially for the occasion, on account of his varlike propensities, spoke of the iniquities of the French Government at Taiti and ended his discourse by exhorting his saintly hearers to be ready for war. “England,” he said, “has braved a thousand years the battle and the breeze.” The paper does not state, that he sung these stirring lines. “Let us prepare to combat Rome, and Rome will perish abhorred, great in her cruelty and her crimes.”—Bravo!

This meeting, composed of various dissenting creeds, which, like Herod and Pilate, widely differing in religious belief, coincided in their condemnation of a just man, unanimously adopted the resolution; other Clergymen also spoke, breathing the same peace and good-will, and the meeting concluded by imploring the assistance of God and the protection of England for the zealous Missionaries, and to expel the French from Taiti. What a modest supplication!

I have said that the French Missionaries were sent out of Taiti at the instigation of the Methodists. A simple exposé of the fact as stated in another newspaper, the Presse, will show it clearly, and convince the public, that the Exeter Hall meeting, instead of blaming the French Government for interfering and taking the Protectorate, ought to blame their brother merchant only, who by his indiscreet zeal and injustice has given cause to it, and had the French Government acted towards him as he treated the two clergymen, they would have put him in the hold of a schooner like the Eliza, and kept him there till his bile was exhausted, or order him out in the S. W. Monsoon.

Some French Clergymen were sent by the authority of Rome, in the year 1834, to the Gambier Islands. The inhabitants having received the light of the Gospel, two of the missionaries, Revd. Messrs. Laval and Care, left Margarova, and reached Taiti Island in the month of November, 1836; no sooner had Mr. Pritchard heard of their approach, than he did every thing he could to prevent them from landing, but they were allowed by one of the Chiefs to go on shore, and the third day after their arrival, they reached Papeiti, and were hospitably received by a relation of the Queen. Some time after their arrival, they were informed that the Ormsduas, the English missionary, was aware of their arrival, that Piritati was furious and endeavoured to persuade the Queen to expel them. On the 25th of November, they were received by Pomare, against the wish of the methodist preacher. They offered the Queen a shawl and some gold, which she accepted, and seeing that Mr. Pritchard did not like it, she said to the Missionaries in an under voice, “Piritati is not good.” Aita Maritai Piritati. On the 26th they were summoned before a tribunal, formed under the auspices of Mr. P. which, to their great surprise, ordered them to leave the Island. Mr. Moerenhout, the American Consul, took the part of the Missionaries, but he received a letter from Piritati, saying that if they did not leave the place, of their own good will, they would be sent on board of the Eliza. The Missionaries, aware of the danger of returning to Gambier during the continuance of the Monsoon, shut themselves in a house given to them by the gentleman who interfered for them, thinking that the authority of the Consul could protect them. But in this they were sadly mistaken. A letter containing the most harsh language was written to them, at the instigation of Mr. Pritchard, and on the 12th of December, their house being forced, they were seized by the hands and feet by the satellites who dragged them before the house of the instigator in that humiliating state, where they remained for some time to allow the Minister of the God of peace to enjoy the refreshing sight of two harmless clergymen suffering such outrage. From thence, they were carried to the shore and sent on board the Eliza, in a canoe filled with water. The Captain, instructed by Mr. Pritchard, put them in the hold, where they were kept, till he could get a person to take charge of the schooner, being afraid to go himself during the Monsoon. Mr. Moerenhout wrote to the French Consul of Valparaiso, who communicated his letter to Mr. Molé, the Minister, and it was then that the Vice-Admiral Rosamel, wrote to the Commander of the Venus Frigate to proceed to Taiti and demand reparation from the Queen. What then followed, is the consequence of the above mentioned facts. Oh! for the genius of Fox, how prominently would the pious Pritchard figure in the pages of that veracious martyrologist had he to record the cruel persecutions of the French at Taiti.

Should an etching be required to aid the representation and bring into fuller relief the unexampled and unmerited sufferings of the martyred methodist merchant, I would suggest that, in the next edition of the martyrs, a copy be taken of the picture this venerable Missionary had once displayed before the astonished gaze of the Taitians, in which was seen the appalling group of a roasted heretic, and a Bishop, and a Monk, accompanied by the dignified presence of his Majesty blowing the coals into flame.

I remain, Sir,

O'CONNELL'S FREEDOM.

It is scarcely possible to conceive the degree of enthusiasm with which the release of the state prisoners was received in Ireland; and yet, though the people met in immense multitudes to celebrate the event, and the most extravagant rejoicings were participated in by all, the hour of triumph has passed, and there is not on record the perpetration of a single act inconsistent with perfect tranquillity. What occurred was so completely unexpected, that when the news of O'Connell's freedom was received, few at first could be persuaded of its truth. Even now it is generally referred to divine interposition, expressly connected with some religious services in which Roman Catholic prisoners and some of their clergy had been engaged, and which only terminated upon the day on which the traverser left the prison. To the feelings of reverence which such a conviction would induce, the good order which regulated the public conduct might be attributed, had there been no popular demonstrations calculated to create intense excitement. But the fact is, the general exultation was manifested in the most extravagant forms, as, for instance, in the "monster procession," which escorted Mr. O'Connell from the Penitentiary, which, however, as well as the "monster dinner" at which he was entertained, we must pass in order to notice very briefly the present aspect of affairs. This, though unsatisfactory in some respects, is undoubtedly far more encouraging than it has yet been. It is quite true that agitation has not ceased; yet the movement has become tempered. Its declared objects, however unattainable, are still of a much less ultra character than those hitherto professed. Above all, there seems to be abroad a spirit of toleration and mutual forbearance which induces men of all parties to admit the sufferings of Ireland, and invites them to co-operate in devising measures of redress. This is a state of things which Mr. O'Connell has done all in his power to promote. He has publicly thanked the Orangemen for their forbearance, and, indeed, the consummate policy which he exhibits in assuming a tone of moderation perfectly inconsistent with his previous conduct, is having a palpable effect. It is winning converts, though converts in degree, and hence we have the Hon. Hely Hutchinson declaring for complete Repeal. Mr. Grey Porter, the conservative High Sheriff of Fermanagh, for a Federal Parliament; and Dr. Maunsel, an Orange corporator, in favour of Her Majesty's holding a Session every third year in Dublin. All these are, in their way, men of influence and character, and form links in a chain which may, sooner or later, connect the moderate men of all parties in one common cause; in which, as in the associations of 1782, religious distinction may for a season, be forgotten. Such a union is by no means so impossible as might at first sight appear. Its possibility, nay its probability, has been admitted; for some members of the late Whig Government are understood to have already made overtures, and it is even said that the present Administration has seen fit to intimate an intention of originating important measures of relief, directed to the social condition of Roman Catholics, whether political or religious. That something must be done to meet the exigencies of the times is clear, if we are to be spared a recurrence of the dangers which have been happily escaped. The question is, whether a wise policy would suggest concession, or the suppression of all agitation, which must contemplate a recourse, if need be, to military power. If concession be wise, the season is opportune, for there is at present no extraordinary excitement. The tone of the repeal press has become moderate: Mr. O'Connell has openly reproved the more violent of his supporters, and denounced a recurrence to the "monster meetings." Indeed, he has gone so far as to signify his intention of transferring agitation to this country—of impeaching Ministers and the Irish Judges. These, and the formation of a number of gentlemen of property and influence into a "Preservative Society," to assemble in Dublin, distinct from the Repeal Association, and there to watch over the interests of the country, were among Mr. O'Connell's latest projects previous to leaving for Derrynane, where he has allowed himself a retirement, of thirty days previous to the commencement of a fresh campaign.

PROPOSED FEVER HOSPITAL, IN CONNECTION WITH THE MEDICAL COLLEGE.

"The rich feel satisfied that they are not trifled with, or kept on the sick list for the sake of prolonging an Apothecary's bill; and the poor are too thankful to find any one who will take a moment's interest in their fate."

"On the 17th December, 1837, Mr. Martin and Mr. Nicolson, two of the Medical members of your Committee, submitted to the rest of your Committee separate Notes, written in consequence of a perusal of Mr. Secretary Mangles' Letter "to the Chairman of the proposed Fever Hospital Committee."

"Having stated that it appears to him that the Committee stands pledged to the Subscribers, and the Public, to establish an Hospital, for the accommodation and cure of persons labouring under the more prevalent acute diseases of the place, and that the Governors of the Native Hospital in their address to the Public in May, 1825, pledged themselves not to encroach upon the constitution of the Native Hospital, Mr. Martin expresses himself as follows:—

“On the subject of the difference in the nature of the relief afforded by the two kinds of Institutions, an Hospital and a Dispensary, I beg to quote from my Note to Mr. Mangles of 3d ultimo, wherein I have said that, ‘Without the aid of an Hospital, in a City like this, fever and dysentery cannot be cured; everything in it is necessary to save life; the regular visits of an European Doctor, aided by an intelligent establishment; its open airy wards and raised clean beds; its regulated diet and clothing, and its general cleanliness—these are all necessary.’ But in a Dispensary, which is only useful to keep men out of Hospital (no small matter in itself) the patient gets his dose of medicine and is cured; or if not, he returns to the very place where he caught his disease, to sleep on the damp ground, to get medicine by chance, and have any diet or clothing the friends choose, together with the absence of all ventilation and cleanliness. In violent illness, therefore, such management can be of little avail in arresting disease. Again, it is not, even in the most dangerous diseases, by medicine alone that a man’s life is to be saved; but by the careful and continued watching of the operations of nature, and those of medicine, so as to determine when to give and withhold drugs. It results from this that Dispensaries take but a secondary or subordinate station, and cannot be compared in active relief to a well ventilated and regulated Hospital.’ Speaking as a Medical man, and viewing the question as it affects the public health, I should feel that I conferred a greater benefit on humanity in one case of acute disease restored to health in an Hospital, (where alone such cases can be treated) than by many scores of cases of doubtful relief afforded through the casual exhibition of doses of medicine at a Dispensary.”

“On the subject of attaching a Fever Ward to each Dispensary, I shall only observe, that such arrangement is not within the plan proposed to the Public. I may however, add that such rooms, unless the positions of the Dispensaries be altered, must prove defective in some of the most essential requisites for the proper treatment of disease; viz., freedom from crowding, openness, and freedom of ventilation; for, without these, the best Medical advice and medicine can be of little or no benefit; indeed, it is doubtful whether an Hospital in a crowded portion of the Town would not be an evil, in place of a relief to humanity, so paramount is an open and airy locality.”

“I shall look forward with anxious, but high expectation, to the time when, as his Lordship points out, the services of well educated Natives may be available for the purposes of Dispensaries, and for officers even of a higher order; indeed, it was one of the earliest advantages stated by me, when I brought the subject first before the Governors of the Native Hospital. I stated, as one of the advantages of a Fever Hospital, that it is in such an Institution ‘alone, they’ (the students) ‘can ever acquire the practical knowledge which can render them generally useful.’ Nothing like the benefit here spoken of can be derived, or is ever derived in Europe, through the attendance of a youthful student at a Dispensary: because the studies of a Dispensary require experience; and that, as I stated before, can alone be acquired in the close observation of treatment, an attention to clinical instruction, and an attentive perusal of the regular diaries of an Hospital: the Hospitals, both Medical and Surgical, are the great, and almost the only Schools of practical Medicine and Surgery in Europe.”

The notes submitted by Mr. Nicolson, were to the following purport:—

“I have repeatedly perused the Letter of Mr. Secretary Mangles, addressed to our Chairman, with very great attention. And shall now proceed to make a few observations on such parts of its contents, as I may be considered competent to give an opinion upon.”

Paragraph 3d. “His Lordship would gladly have seen consideration given to the advantages to be derived to the general care of health, and particularly for watching the approach of epidemic fever and providing means of general relief in case of its prevalence, from the establishment of one great Hospital, as compared with the benefits which would be afforded at the same expense by an increased number of Dispensaries.”

TUAM.—His Grace the Archbishop of Tuam has been pleased to make the following changes in his clergy:—The Rev. Mr. Roche, to Clifden, to succeed the Rev. John Moran, removed to Turlough, to succeed the Rev. Mr. Ferucke, removed to Roundstone, to succeed the Rev. Mr. Barret, removed to Ballindine, to succeed the Rev. Mr. Grogan, removed to Newport, to succeed the Rev. P. Jennings, removed to Westport, to succeed the Rev. P. Geraghty, removed to Castlebar, to succeed the Rev. P. Harly, lately appointed parish priest of Aran. The patriotic and spirited inhabitants of Clifden presented the Rev. Mr. Moran with an address and entertained him at a public dinner at Carr’s Hotel on Tuesday last.—Tuam Herald.

THE MASS IN PRISON.—The following bishops and clergymen celebrated Mass in the Liberator’s chapel since our last publication of a similar list:—Right Rev. Dr. Cantwell, Bishop of Meath; Rev. Henry Young; Rev. Gregory Lynch, St. Andrew’s, Westland-row; Very Rev. Dr. Spratt, Carmelites; Rev. Mr. Withers, Carmelites; Rev. Mathew Collier, C.C., Rathmines; Rev. Mr. Fay, Meath-street; Rev. Mr. Macaulay, Adam and Eve; Rev. Wm. Gilligan; Rev. Mr. Ennis, Meath-street; Rev. Mr. Kavanagh, C.C., Kingstown; Rev. Mr. Goodman, Denmark-street; Rev. Mr. Coghlan, county Meath; Rev. James Hamilton.—Freeman.

THE PILGRIMS OF MARYLAND.*

The history of the world in all past time (save only its original resolution from chaos to order) presents nothing so grand, imposing and wonderful as the discovery and settlement of the western continent. It may be considered, indeed, rather a creation, than a discovery; for it brought into being states and dominions and empires, and first nourished on its virgin soil that hardy race who recollected tyranny only to resolve on freedom. The gales of western forests, full of the inspiration caught in their swift flight across their native wilds, fanned that flame of independence, whose silent promptings and open opposition, so largely contributed to people our shores. All of heroism, all of romance, all of daring adventure which the world had ever seen before, was immeasurably distanced here. Well are the descendants of the original emigrants entitled to point to the achievements of their fathers as the noblest deeds in the annals of time; for all that history records of migrations and conquests of tribes and nations, that tradition tells of kingdoms won and nations subdued, nay, fable and fiction, in their wildest imaginings, never approached the wonderful story of a trackless ocean traversed in frail and petty vessels, a new world discovered, a hundred nations subdued by a mere handful of men, millions of acres redeemed from fruitless nature to teeming cultivation, and peace and civilization, plenty and prosperity in less than two centuries succeeding to war and barbarism, famine and distress. The work still goes on, and each succeeding generation wonders at the progress. It is the interminable journey of him, who, in circumnavigating the globe, finds that the horizon for ever recedes as he advances. In the inducements to this enterprise and in the means of its accomplishment, the agents and the policy of their operations were widely different.

If human knowledge could discern the future, it might have been supposed that such diversity would not have existed: for in the preparations for the voyage of Columbus, in his acts when the hope became the certainty of discovery, in the first title granted in America and in the efforts immediately made for its inhabitants, there was a unity of generous and benevolent feeling and action, which will for ever reflect lustre on those who planned, aided and effected the first voyage across the Atlantic.

There seem to be men specially created for all the various exigencies of human affairs. The changes of the world never cease for want of agents competent to their fulfilment and direction; for the doctrine of political economy, that demand regulates supply, applies to mind as well as matter. Thus we find that in the reclamation and settlement of this hemisphere, master-spirits rose, as if by magic, to fulfil their destiny. Whether the arts of peace or war, science or common sense, prowess or policy, boldness or caution were demanded for each detail of the grand result, some one was ever at hand endowed with the very qualities required. The names of Raleigh, Delaware, Baltimore, Penn. Winthrop, Smith, Berkely, Williams, Mason, Gorges, Carteret, Oglethorpe, embrace but a portion of the glorious catalogue of these rare beings. They were not all so good, as great; but there was perhaps altogether less of human frailty than usually taints the characters of conquerors and founders of governments; for too often splendour of intellect is but the gorgeous covering which conceals depravity of heart. And these great eras of convulsions in politics, of some nations the death, of others the birth, have ever developed the greatest minds. But as the thunder most majestic and lightning most sublime are, at the same time, most terrible and destructive, so heroes sometimes derive their sublime majesty from the terrible destruction which they inflict on the human race. There are other moral conquerors whose path is marked not by blood, but blessings. Some of those named were distinguished for all those virtues, which, when fully developed, constitute perfection; and first among the foremost were the Calverts, the illustrious founders of the province of Maryland.

George, the first Lord Baltimore, was of a reputable, but not distinguished family of Yorkshire in England. His education was sedulously attended to, and he graduated at the University of Oxford, having been a member of Trinity College. His talents, and more especially practical business habits, early obtained the notice and patronage of Sir Robert Cecil, the great earl of Salisbury, the friend of Sir Walter Raleigh and minister of Elizabeth and James. He was employed as Cecil's private secretary, became secretary to the Privy Council, was knighted and finally appointed Secretary of State. He sat in Parliament, first for his native country and afterwards for the University of Oxford. On the high road to the first offices of state, the friend of the king and of the king's favourite, he paused for a moment, in the pursuits of this life to contemplate the next. He found that there was neither unity of belief nor charity of practice among the numerous sects into which, even at that early time, the Reformation had divided those who were reformed. He knew that but one could be right, for truth is ever a unit, and each assured him that all the others were wrong. Buffeted and tossed in the storms of controversy, he found a secure haven in the bosom of the Catholic Church. Soon as conviction converted doubt into certainty, he resigned his office, ceasing to be the servant of his king in order to become the servant of his God. He discarded the emoluments of earth for the rewards of heaven, and exchanged the bright hopes of the present for the unfading certainties of the future. He openly avowed his recanta-

* We are much pleased that we have it in our power to place before the reader this interesting outline of the first settlement of Maryland. As an evidence of its merit, we have only to state that, having delivered it as a lecture before the Carroll Institute in Philadelphia, the author was solicited and induced to repeat it in the same city. The publication of the article at this moment may serve to prepare the public mind, and to kindle a congenial feeling for the joyous commemoration of the landing of the Pilgrims, which is to take place on the 10th of May, in St. Mary's county, Md.

James, a high churchman from policy as well as principle, was never obnoxious to his Catholic subjects, and they respected him as the son of a martyr and the undoubted heir to the crown. Their good feeling was reciprocated, and this general liberality, combined with personal kindness for Calvert, enabled him to retain a seat in the Privy Council and led to his advancement to the green honor of an Irish title. His associates, Feil, Raleigh and others, and more especially his connection with the London Company of Adventurers, to whom James granted, in 1606, all the territory extending from Cape Fear to what is now the southern line of Maryland, had fully impregnated him with those ardent hopes of the success of the western settlements which then pervaded England. He obtained a grant of part of Newfoundland, to which he gave the name of Avelon in imitation of Old Avelon in Somersetshire, wherein Glassonbury stands, the first fruits of Christianity in Britain, as the other was in that part of America. After two voyages and unceasing dangers and difficulties a settlement was effected. On his second visit he recovered more than twenty ships which had been taken by the French, and captured several of the enemy's vessels. He continued this plantation till his death; but finding the soil barren, the climate unfavourable, and the place exposed to the attacks of the French, he turned his attention to Virginia, and visited it with the intention of making it his abode. Immediately on his arrival the Assembly required him to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. To the former he did not object, and in vain endeavoured to induce the authorities to modify the latter. They insisted that he should absolutely renounce the spiritual authority of the Pope and disown him as the head of the Church. He refused, and it became necessary that he should at once leave the colony. Wandering in search of an asylum, he explored the shores of the Chesapeake bay, and finding the country unsettled and admirably adapted to his purposes, he instantly returned to England to procure the grant of it. A favourite of the royal family, sustained by considerations of important services, distinguished for his untiring enterprise, respected for his high moral worth, he found no difficulty in procuring from the son of his former master (the unfortunate Charles) a grant of the province of Maryland. This instrument contains internal evidence that it was prepared by Calvert, and the fact is asserted by more than one writer. By it the rights of the proprietor and the liberties of the people are carefully guarded, while the interests of the crown, excepting as connected with the protection of the infant colony, are almost forgotten. It provides that the necessary laws, not repugnant but agreeable, so far as might be, to those of England, should be enacted by the freemen of the province or their delegates chosen for that purpose, and should be executed by their authority. License was given to the subjects of Great Britain to emigrate to this colony, and to organize an armed force for their protection; they were to remain liege men of the king and enjoy all the privileges of British subjects. Freedom of export and import was guaranteed. The proprietary was invested with all the powers of governor and general, authorized to repel invasions and to declare martial law. Power was given to impose by law taxes and subsidies on articles imported or exported, the product of which taxes was given to the proprietary for ever, and it was covenanted on the part of the king that neither he nor his successors should ever impose customs, quotas, taxes or contributions on the people, their property, or their merchantable commodities laden within the province. The entire document exhibits not less the strong attachment to popular liberty than the political wisdom and foresight of its author. It stands alone in the list of American colonial papers. The last condition referred to looked far into futurity, anticipated and guarded against those tax laws of the British Parliament which, more than a century afterwards, roused to resistance all the colonies and resulted in that memorable Declaration of Independence which is but the extension of the principles embraced in this charter.—Religious Cabinet.

IRELAND.

THE MOST REV. THE ARCHBISHOP OF TUAM TO THE RIGHT HON. SIR ROBERT PEEL, BART.

St. Jarlath's, Tuam, August 12, 1844.

SIR,—Amidst all the fatigues and anxieties of office, a few must doubtless be cheered by the retrospect of the recent victories which your policy has achieved in the house of Commons. Not only have you subdued the mutinous members who, on the sugar question, presumed to dispute your supremacy, thus reducing them to a worse slavery than that of the Indians, for whose lot they affected such hollow commiseration, but you have been also so successful in taming the fiery patriotism of the Celtic Whigs as to make them put on with the utmost equanimity the ignominious yoke of the Saxon Tories. By what magic can a minister evoke such power as to overcome those formidable difficulties, it would be beyond the range of my present object to inquire. I know not whether there are any such romantic believers in the mere influence of unassisted oratory as to ascribe your success to your rhetorical powers of persuasion. Some think Pitt is the great idol of your political idolatry. Others fancy they can trace a nearer resemblance in yours to the policy pursued by Walpole. But be the prototype what it may, it is certain that with all the dextrous distribution of the treasures of the state, which they so profusely squandered among their retainers, they could never rival you in the winning ways in which you can make converts and rule an obsequious senate.

Never was the observation better verified, that "no one can serve two masters," than in the universal execration which the Irish members have earned and called forth on this occasion. They may have risen in ministerial favour, but they have proportionably sunk in the estimation of the people. They were sent to sustain, and not to sell, their interests. In provoking the vengeance of ruthless landlords by the exercise of their franchise, to which devotion many of the once-comfortable farmers of Ireland have become victims and outcasts upon the world, they fancied at least they would have the consolation of returning Catholics to Parliament who would watch over their interests and protect their religion. They never dreamt that whilst voting they were to be doomed to the two-fold misfortune of being driven themselves from their houses, and betrayed by their false representatives. Yet, such are now the bitter reflections of thousands of the honest freeholders of Ireland in witnessing the recent apostasy of the Irish members. Their conduct admits of no palliation. At the tail of the session, verifying the ancient proverb of being fraught with poison, a measure clearly and incontestibly bearing on the face of it evidence of hatred to the Catholic religion, is introduced into Parliament, and instead of meeting with opposition from the professing Catholics of the House, is hailed as a boon conferred on the Catholics of Ireland (!). They might have delivered their own individual opinions, and poured forth their gratitude for the showers of ministerial patronage for which they thirsted; but they had no right to misrepresent and insult the Catholic people. No time was allowed for petition or remonstrance: but even during the brief interval in which the bill was hastily precipitated through the House, there was more than sufficient of the public feeling manifested to convince them if they were not deaf and blind, that the bill was universally execrated. Numbers of the Catholic clergy and people petitioned against it. Many of the Catholic bishops from the provinces, some in union with their clergy, and others assembled in Synod, sent forth in explicit terms their remonstrances and their reasons against this atrocious bill. The Repeal Association, the best and most unequivocal organ of the feelings of the Irish people, denounced it. The public journals that reflect faithfully the national mind were equally unsparing of their condemnation of this penal measure. The son of the great and revered individual who is now paying the forfeit of loving his country and his faith too well, found it necessary, in defence of his father's insulted honour, whose name was attempted to be treacherously mixed up with this odious transaction, to come forward and repel the idea of any, even a constructive identification, with a bill of which the accursed object is, to rivet again the fetters which he was so successful in breaking. Thus, through every channel from which the feelings of the people usually find vent was poured indignant condemnation of the measure, and yet the recreant members for Ireland, it is unnecessary to point out the exception, persevere to welcome as a boon a bill so universally stigmatised. Amidst the numbers of bishops and priests who opposed it, not a solitary voice was raised in its favour.—Let it not be insinuated that any half or qualified consent, such as might be construed into an index of political coquetry, was whispered from any quarters. The insinuation on which some members rest as an apology must be a downright calumny. The Irish bishops are not, thank God! so timid or time-serving as to suppress their opinions upon any great public question vitally affecting the interests of their religion. This was one; and so manifestly unreasonable, irreligious, and persecuting were the provisions of that enactment, that not one member of the House, however disposed to trifle with episcopal authority, would venture to affirm that it had the suffrage of even one solitary bishop in its favour.

Never was the loss or absence of the Liberator of Ireland more felt or to be more lamented than on this unfortunate occasion. It was a master-stroke of a terrible policy to strike first their great political pastor, in order by the easy seduction of their other more pliant representatives to prostrate once more the civil and religious liberties of the people. Had the ever-faithful and watchful sentinel of Ireland been suffered to be at his post, you would not have attempted, or would have attempted in vain, to bribe the venal, and then bind in shackles the Catholic Church. His seasonable letters would have conveyed lessons of awful warning to the Catholic people. The tones of his indignant denunciation, would have rolled dismay along the benches of the Treasury, and checked the terrified minister from profanely handling the sacred ark of our religion. His glance would have rebuked into sullen duty the disposition to desertion which often before appeared among his own unfaithful troops. Time, which at last does justice to all, is, even during his life-time, throwing light upon his policy; and when we consider the nature of the instruments with which he had to work, we must wonder, not that he was unable to effect much good, but that he was endued with sufficient power to resist the course of evil legislation into which his political allies must have been perpetually dragging him. And yet, heedless as they were of episcopal remonstrance against this execrable bill, those Catholic members were most anxious for episcopal aid in working out its provisions (!). True, the bishops might not understand it; but though they could not understand it in principle, they were for that very reason the more fitting instruments to work it in practice. These gentlemen are wise in their generation. It was not convenient to attend to the remonstrances of the bishops in the debate, for they well knew if attended to the bill would have never passed into law. But it was more convenient to share with bishops the odium and the disgrace of working it, and to set up two or three episcopal targets to intercept the execration which was sure to follow upon the practical agents of so anti-religious a measure. We were told until the repetition tired, that the board could not give satisfaction if it only consisted of laymen. Did it then follow as a matter of course that it would give satisfaction if managed by crown-created episcopal commissioners? As Catholics, they should know that the objection against the one held equally against the others, and that bishops cannot, more than laymen, derive from the Crown or Parliament any power or commission to manage and reduce to practice a law that strikes at the root of the holiest principles of our faith, that blights with its deadly poison the goodliest fruits which religion ever produced, and aims at producing schism, anarchy and disorder in the Church of God.

These are the three positions to which I shall confine my present letter. Why, it may be asked, introduce and persist in retaining the damning clause of invalidating the will of an unjust spoliator, should he not be fortunate enough to "redeem his soul by alms," by disposing of his real property three months before his decease? Let not the abettors of this bill affect to be shocked at the epithet with which it is qualified. In the hands of God alone is left the lot and judgment of all his creatures; but as he has revealed to us that a reparation of injuries, the restitution of ill-gotten property, and the liberal distribution of charity and alms-deeds, are, in the dispensations of his mercy, among the most ordinary channels of conveying the graces of pardon, I will calmly inquire of the reader, who is it that is most disposed to trench upon the prerogatives of the Almighty, and the strict right of all his sinful creatures, he who would dry up, or he who would leave untouched those channels of mercy? Hitherto they were sacred; some of the poor of Ireland have been refreshed with the bounty of these channels. It is to be hoped that, like the alm-deeds of Cornelius, those benefactions were the means of drawing down on their donors the grace of pardon and salvation. And yet the heartless framers of this clause expect that Catholic bishops will become parties in closing the doors of comfort against the poor and of salvation against the wealthy. Perhaps you are not aware of the strange expedients to which vanity prompts numbers in order to purchase property, to acquire what is called a political position, or parliamentary influence in a county, some scruple not to raise monies and plunge themselves into embarrassments in order to purchase an estate. If, in such cases, debts should have accumulated, so that the conditions cannot be easily found—if there were left no personal or chattel property to meet those obvious claims of justice; and if besides—as often happens—there were no near or immediate kinsmen to whom injustice could appear to have been done, what must be thought of the horrid cruelty of law which would forbid a poor sinner, in such circumstances, from disposing of his property at his death in a manner which would fructify in the blessings of charity or education? Think you that bishops will be found to put a seal on the insulting calumny that the death-bed of the wealthy is too often besieged by sinister influence? It may be useful to inform you that the reverse is often the case, that the ministering priest is the best friend of the broken hearted widow and the orphan, and whilst he exhorts the heirless wealthy to aid the institutions raised for the fatherless, there are found numberless instances where the pious and considerate clergyman is the protector of the claims of the children and other kinsmen.

After thus striving to sever the religious links that bind God and his creatures at the awful moment of death, it naturally enough pursues those religious orders which have sprung from the holy influence of those doctrines. And think you that the bishops will subscribe to the unchristian policy first conceived by a Portuguese minister, that dooms to annihilation some of the noblest orders that ever flourished in the Catholic Church? Is it thus you deal with the best promoters of public instruction? Are you really an advocate for free and enlightened education, or is the profession of zeal for it only a mask to hide the ministerial despotism which aims at the subjugation of the mind and intellect of the people? I well recollect the Parliamentary depositions of Mr. Anthony Blake regarding the religious orders. The perfection of every character requires consistency, and, as he would be no doubt a fit instrument to manage the new board, he could not be forced to encourage those orders, of the value of which he had given such creditable testimony. Besides, as you have taken the National Board under your protection, it must have no rival. The board is yet supported by a grant out of the Consolidated Fund, until, like the military barracks or the pauper bastilles the country is covered with the Government schools, where it is sought that no national sentiment should be lisped no national feeling cherished, and no national emblem worn. By-and-by John Bull will begin to growl at the abstraction out of his pocket of such an enormous amount of the Consolidated Fund, and then to appease him the grant must be raised in the shape of a county cess from a ground-down tenantry. Such shall be the bitter fruits to the Irish people of your gratuitous education!! These are not conjectures; the written plans of some of those embryo ministers of public instruction are now before me. They have been already realised in the plans by which the constabulary of the country are supported. The soldiers were paid out of the Consolidated Fund; but when John Bull protested against paying for the troops, the peasantry were oppressed with the payment of half the tax which came before out of the imperial revenue.

To feed the poor with the spontaneous fruit of charity never would have done without an mercenary staff of gentlemen paupers to annex to the concern, and to enforce taxes for their relief. To rear edifices for public instruction, and to endow them with the spontaneous benefactions of the pious and the wealthy, would not have answered the purposes of those who are aiming at creating in Ireland the educational despotism that is crumbling in France. Hence no religious orders are to be tolerated. Hence no pious bequests, or charitable donations to sustain them. Were they suffered to rear their heads in the country, and were they to receive any support from legalised charities, the national board and its schools would become nuisances; and all the employment of its ministerial stations would be for ever gone. Therefore, the best instructors that ever reared and matured the young mind of a nation must be proscribed with penalties; and the sons of Ignatius, who have left no science unexplored, and no field of literature uncultivated, whose zeal has travelled through every clime, and to whose healing benevolence no human woe has been stranger, must be sacrificed to a ruthless, penal and inexorable law which blows its pestiferous breath over the fairest fruit that ever gladdened the Christian vineyard. Think you that bishops can be parties to such a pestilence, or that the Roman Pontiff could relish such a participation in the proscription of one of the religious orders.

But the more frightful and daring, and revolutionary portion of the bill is yet to be noticed and execrated. Those Crown commissioners, whether laymen or bishops; are to adjudicate by their signatures on rights, privileges, liberties and duties on which they have no more right to adjudicate than the Emperor of Morocco. Think you that any bishops will, at the bidding of the Crown, undertake thus to usurp the rights of their brethren, and of the Roman Pontiff? The bishop alone, under the Pope, has the necessary and inalienable right to adjudicate who may be the legitimate pastors and dignitaries in his diocese; the Pope, alone, who are the bishops and archbishops; and to attempt a decision on these points, without the consent of the parties, would be an encroachment on their authority, and a subversion of the essential discipline of the Catholic Church. It is not difficult to imagine (other fresh instances, not yet alluded to, have occurred in the colonies) that the bishop would defend the rights of the canonical pastor, and that some contumacious pretender would appeal to the Crown or the Board of Commissioners. What would such an appeal be but the bringing of a case from the sole rightful judge to an uncanonical tribunal? If it should be urged by the Catholic slaves, who love the measure for its patronage, that such a collision of judgment between the episcopal commissioners and the ordinary, would not be probable, and, therefore, should not be feared, the answer is, the interests of the Catholic Church do not depend on the contingencies of personal feelings. What is wrong in principle must be wrong in practice. To him, certainly, the volume of history would be like an old almanac, who would not pronounce with certainty that many such collisions would soon take place, and shake the repose of the Catholic Church to its centre. Think you that bishops will be found to lend their aid to such a schismatical concern? The principle is wrong, essentially wrong, and no one can advocate a false doctrine in theory that is not prepared, if beset with temptation, to carry it out to the most pernicious consequences to which such a false doctrine can lead.

Having, then, disposed of those principles of the bill, its interference with the practical freedom of the most salutary doctrines of the Catholic Church, next its blighting influence on religious education and morality—the fruits of those doctrines—and, finally, its tendency to schism and anarchy in the Church, I must adjourn some further considerations, illustrative of the bad spirit in which it originated, and the incalculable mischief of which any Catholic sanction of it would be productive.

I have the honour to be, your very obedient servant,
✠ JOHN, ARCHBISHOP OF TUAM.

ANNALS OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE PROPGATION OF THE FAITH.

The number for May (just published) of this truly interesting and edifying publication contains the annual report for the present year, which enters at great length on the state and progress of Catholicism throughout Europe, Asia, Africa, America, &c., imparting a vast body of important information, amongst which is a statistical calculation of the number of bishops and priests in the countries which the Association has been instrumental in evangelizing, the totals of which are as follow:—Europe, 27 bishops, 843 priests; Western, Central and Eastern Asia, 71 bishops, 2,736 priests; Africa, 6 bishops, 163 priests; America, 28 bishops, 890 priests; Oceania, 7 bishops, 113 priests; forming a grand total of missions (17 bishoprics and 23 vicariates apostolic since 1822), 139 bishops and 4,750 priests. In these calculations the countries which are entirely Catholic are omitted. In 1840 there were 119 bishops and 4,220 priests. The contributions to the Association during the year 1843 amounted to £141,292 12s. 10d., and the disbursements to £145,524 0s. 3d., which, with what remained on hand at the close of the year 1843, amounting to £23,838 14s. 5d., leaves a balance in favour of the Association of £19,607 7s. 0d. The number of the "Annals" now under notice also contains communications abounding with interesting information from Father Walter Clifford, O.S.J., dated Trichinopoly, August 15, 1843; from the Missionaries of the Society of Jesus in Madura; from the Rev. Mr. Luquet, dated Pondicherry, October 17, 1843; from the Right Rev. Dr. Pallegoix, Bishop of Mallos and Vicar Apostolic of Siam; from the Rev. Mr. Albrand, and Rev. Mr. Grandjean, Missionaries Apostolic in the kingdom of Siam; from the Rev. Mr. Clemenceau; from the Right Rev. Dr. Ferreol, Bishop elect of Bellin, and Vicar Apostolic of Corea; a letter of the Rev. Mr. Chastan who received the crown of Martyrdom during the general persecution in Corea, in the year 1839, and which he wrote on the day on which he surrendered himself prisoner; and a letter from the Right Rev. Dr. Bonnard, Vicar Apostolic of Pondicherry. — Orthodox Journal.

CATHOLICITY AND BOTANY.

(From the Orthodox Journal.)

Living in a beautiful part of the country, where I have a very good garden, after the fatigues of the day I recreate myself therein. Some of the earliest flowers in the spring are gathered in it, and I generally contrive to have an elegant nosegay upon the altar of my parish church upon the feast of the Purification.

Yet I am not inclined to boast, else I could tell of several occasions when I have gained prizes at the flower shows, and how certain seeds are especially valued if known to have come from my plants.

Two articles on the Catholicity of Botany have already appeared in this Journal. It was there shown how the vegetable world harmonized with the feeling of the church in her different festivals, and how the flowers were named after the saints on whose festivals they were known to blow. But what a serious, if not fatal, blow did not our sciences receive on the introduction of Protestantism into this country! Immediately a debasement in all our sciences took place. Painting, music, sculpture and architecture, degenerated similar in character, but inferior in execution, to what they were in the times of the pagans.

The science of botany was also then debased. The religion and poetry of botany was grievously marred, and the old works that spoke to us concerning the religion of flowers then had to give way to such productions as the "Language of Flowers" "Sentiment of Flowers," &c. How much more beautiful is the idea of calling to the mind some great saint by names such as "Sweet William"—"Herb Robert," than by naming a plant "Lady's Finger." If the sweet name, alluding to the Mother of God, "Marygold," be a type of the fourteenth, the name "Kiss-me-at-the-garden-gate" is characteristic of the nineteenth century.

Again, what sainted recollections are not conjured up by the names "Timothy-grass," "St. Barnaby's Thistle," "St. John's Wort"? But to the ear-Protestant a more orthodox sound would be "Venus' Comb."

Indeed, the plants upon which we heedlessly tread in a careless moment suggest to us, when in a serious mood, some, joyful—some, serious reflections.

While passing a small flower, and, from its beauty, judging of the surpassing beauty of its Creator, what a tender appeal does not the Creator make to us in its name—"Forget me not"? What contentment in poverty was not taught the shepherd when, while tending his flocks, he saw them crop the Shepherd's purse? How did it console him that he who clothed his sheep would much provide for him food and clothing.

In the gardens of the monks, besides the plants destined to grace their frugal table, they cultivated others for their symbolical character that, whenever the eye rested on them, it might read a lesson of virtue.

They were taught charity and love of one another by the looses-trife—to reckon their time by the day's-eye and the night-shade—to guard against their spiritual enemies by the dent-de-lion, the wolf's-claw, and the snake-weed—and they learnt the imperishable nature of the reward of their holy lives by the "everlasting."

If one of their brethren was ailing they found in their garden for his impaired sight the eye-bright—for a wound the wound-wort—against infection pestilent-wort—if he had a fever, fever-few—if stung by a snake adder-wort—and if an indescribable all-overness was his sickness, the remedy was the all-heal.

The traveller in those ages found the speed-well greeting him at every step on his journey, and the traveller's-joy to lessen the fatigue of the way. If he had to climb a rugged ascent the "Jacob's-ladder" that grew by its side reminded him of the road to heaven.

But to return to the garden of the monk.

The beautiful flowers of the "noli me tangere" taught him that sin, however pleasing under one aspect, was most dangerous. The "Star of Bethlehem," flowering in April and May, taught him that the nativity of his Saviour was to be contemplated at that season as well as at Christmas. The "archangel" and the "angelical" taught him the veneration and respect due to the choirs of blessed spirits. The "golden-rod" taught him that his Maker ruled him not with a rod of iron. The "monk's hood" reminded him of the state of perfection he had chosen and the humility that it required.

We would gladly see our churches decked on the great festivals, as they used to be, with flowers. We would gladly see the porch and pavement covered with sprigs of yew, cypress, and box, as was formerly the case. On St. Cecily's feast the altar used to be decked with "Sweet Cecily." On St. Dorothy's with the hyacinth called after her; on the day of St. John with St. John's-wort; and on the festivals of the Blessed Virgin Mary with the Marygold.

And we would rejoice to see our gardens filled with flowers that, by their symbolical meaning might instruct and edify us. The Cross-wort would teach us with St. Paul to glory in the cross of Christ; the money-wort would teach us poverty of spirit; the spleen-wort would teach us charity and brotherly love.

A love of flowers, both for their own loveliness and for their symbolism, always accompanied true Catholic feeling.

They were used formerly and we hope to see them again more extensively used, in the decoration of the altar and the church.

The snowdrop on the altar would remind one if nothing else did, that the festival was the Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary. The passion-flower told of the Easter season; the red roses were put on the altar on the feast of martyr, and the white lily on that of the pure virgin. The holly and its red berry told of the joyful season of Christmas.

And, that the church might for the ornament of flowers be in some measure independent of the seasons, the carver's chisel changed the stone into imperishable flowers. The oak leaf and apple, the vine leaf and fruit, the ivy and its berry, the trefoil and cinquefoil have been changed into evergreens by the chisel of the carver.

The churches of the Benedictines were ornamented with the "Herb Bennet" carved in stone. This carving may be seen in York minster.

In this light was the science of botany looked on when England was Catholic and merry. It was cherished in and emanated from the cloister, where it was, not as now, the study of the idle, but the idleness of the studious, so the cloister was a protection to it. But in later time when England became Protestant and distracted botany was found by the dominant party to need reform. Then was it that the Protestant botanist attempted to degrade the science by introducing such names and terms as Venus' comb, ho-weed, ladies' fingers, mare's tail, ladies' tresses, navel-wort, none-so-pretty, ladies' slippers, &c.

But we hope that better days are in store for us. It requires no prophetic eye to see Catholicity in her giant power, striding over the length and breadth of the land, and she is already beginning to take all the sciences again under her protection.

THE TOMB OF ST. CARLO BOYARMO.

Immediately beneath the dome of that "white under" of northern Italy, the gorgeous marble cathedral of the stately city of Milan, is the subterranean chapel which contains the body of this great and good man. A more sumptuous place of sepulchre was never allotted to the relics of human morality. Basso-relievos of massive silver incrust the roof, plates of gold adorn the front of the shrine, upon removing which a sarcophagus of crystal exhibits the deceased prelate clothed in his archiepiscopal robes, with a crozier gemmed with brilliants lying by his side, and old and jewels adorning every part of his person. The remains of the Saint are in a state of very remarkable preservation, and his whole body seems to have escaped the ordinary progress of decomposition. The fine aquiline nose which so distinctively marked the lineaments of the archbishop, and by which his numerous portraits and statues are so immediately identified, is of the lifeless corpse the still characteristic feature, and the discoloration of time, rather than any of the usual ravages of death, seems to have effected change in the aspect of the prelate, whose decease occurred in 1584. Two centuries and a half have intervened, but not consumed, the fleshly covering of his venerated reliquie. The Milanese naturally regard with extraordinary respect the tomb of their patron Saint, whose body they perhaps might deem to have been thus miraculously preserved from decay. We would not impugn that presumption, because we are inclined to spare it: we will, however, take occasion to remark that Europe affords many instances of human bodies being, from some peculiarity in the soil wherein they happen to be interred, preserved for centuries in a wonderful state of entirety and incorruption. Beneath the church of Reutensberg, near Bonn, are undecayed corpses of twenty-five monks: and in the vaults of St. Michael's tower at Bordeaux is a truly remarkable assemblage of dead bodies well preserved, though centuries have elapsed since their inhumation.

If ever great man deserved well of his countrymen, it was the philanthropic St. Carlo Borromeo. The austerities and self-denial of his private life were incredibly rigorous, while to him with whom his high family and cardinal's rank brought him into daily communication, he was lavish in the exercise of hospitality.

A touching anecdote of his unassuming, self-inflicted penitence, was related of the Saint by the bishop of Asti, who, upon the occasion of a visitation of the diocese, surprised St. Charles, in the middle of a bitterly cold night studying in a single black and tattered gown. Upon being treated to put on some warmer garment, the archbishop replied with a smile, "What will you say if I have no other? The robes which I am obliged to wear in the day belong to the dignity of cardinal, but this garment is my own, and I will have no other, either for winter or summer." The poor had indeed always been the rewards of his worldly wealth! The crowning merit, however, of St. Charles' glory, was the indefatigable zeal with which, utterly regardless of personal safety, he laboured for the spiritual wants and administered to the temporal necessities of his flock, during the great and fatal pestilence of 1575. During that disastrous time, he melted his plate, sold his furniture and parted with the very bed he lay upon, to provide relief for the poor,—passing his days with the inmates of pest houses and his nights on the bare boards. Conduct like this might well entitle a cardinal archbishop to live in the grateful hearts of his fellow-citizens, and the magnificent sepulchre of Milan attests the fond reverence they still entertain for one who loved and served them on earth, and now prays for them in heaven.—Catholic Magazine.

THE ABBEY OF MOUNT MELLERAY.

(From the Waterford Chronicle.)

As advocates of the poor and the forsaken—of those who are homeless and penniless, friendless and unknown strangers among countless thousands in this world of woe and worthlessness, we hail the monastic institution of Mount Melleray, as an oasis in the desert a green spot to please the eye and take the heart captive. The value of such institutions is not known in this degenerate age of ours. Monasteries formerly adorned the land; monasteries, where the poor received relief, because the donors were religious; and the recipients of that relief accepted it as Heaven's gift, and prayed for their benefactors. Thus was charity twice blessed"—it blessed him that gave and him that received. To-day we have work-houses, in which every vestige of home is destroyed. Only think of the exquisite, the heart-touching beauty of the Scottish song—

"These fifty years, John Anderson, my Joe," and ask yourselves is it not the irruption of a new-fangled barbarism which could check that feeling. In the workhouses even the old are persecuted, who have no son, no daughter, to have persecutors in the place where there is no home. The aged couple who have lived together for half a century—whose hearts are intertwined round each other—Siamese twins in moral affection—to whom separation would be death; these, even these, are dragged from each other, by the cold-blooded and murderous hand of that cool and calculating, and heartless utilitarian thing called Scottish economy. Again, we say, that we rejoice in the establishment of monastic institutions as blessings in the land. If we believe the Scriptures, we must rejoice that in our land are to be found holy men—rare exemplars of virtue, sufficient to redeem the guilt of the Isle from God's visitation. Ten just souls would have saved the criminal cities of Sodom and Gomorrah; and ought not we to rejoice that we have hundreds such souls amongst us—men given to God and the poor? And it is not only that, but the rare edification of their example—beacon lights to priests and to people. Even the pious priest runs from the bad world, and seeks a retreat among those holy people where his zeal is reanimated, his heart influenced with holy ardour, his spirit purified, and he returns to his flock refreshed for work in the vineyard of Christ, with his shield buckled on, "to fight the good fight," and win the battle. The once barren heath is now reclaimed, through the industry of the monks, and affords practical evidence as to what might be done in improving our waste lands, had we the benefit of a fostering or protective Legislature. From what we can learn it costs 60*l.* to transplant or transport an emigrant, and give him anything in the way of a settlement. If the emigration-mongers would only think what such a sum could effect for a poor man and his family at home, we would not be so ready to part with our people and our money. In the mere reclamation of the former waste, on which the Monastic Institution of Mount Mellera is situated, the monks have set a fine example to our aristocracy. But the goodness of the monks extends far beyond what may be called physical industry. Their chapel, or rather church, is ever open to the people, who can enjoy the sacrifice of the Mass; and whenever fever, or any other epidemic invades the poor, the monks are zealous coadjutors of the secular clergy. The weary traveller, no matter from what part of Ireland or the world, finds a resting place and relief at their gates; and the children of the surrounding poor have that richest of secular blessings—the benefit of sound moral education, which is further improved by expositions of Christian doctrines. Here are multitudinous advantages. But these are not all. There are at present twenty poor men employed at Mount Mellera throughout the year, at ninepence per day; and thus is support afforded to almost one hundred individuals, taking, as we may, the average of families at five. Here is an epitome of good, moral and religious,—and of physical comfort also, achieved by one institution; and let no one tell us that a multiplication of such institutions would not be God's own gift to our land. May the cursed Poor Law, a practical outrage on religion, be soon overthrown, and may we have a revival of the good old times, when the rich felt that they were Heaven's stewards, and that it was a sacred obligation to relieve the poor.

MISCELLANEA.

(From the Times.)

The Cistercians were founded 746 years ago by Robert, Abbot of Molesme, who, with a few devoted monks, retired to the monastery of Cîteaux, situate in a wild and desert place near Chalons-sur-Saone, in order that they might restore more perfectly the austere rules of St. Benedict. From this beginning the order increased rapidly, and extended all over Europe. Their first abbey built in England was at Waverley, in Surrey, in the year 1129; but in the reign of Edward I. there were no less than sixty-four Cistercian houses, including Fountains, Furness, Tintern, Joreval, Kirkstall, and a host of others of notable memory. At the time of the Reformation many of the scattered "religious" emigrated to the Continent; but when that in its turn afforded them no longer a refuge, the English Cistercians of La Trappe in France returned to this country, and, after experiencing many vicissitudes, settled near Sheepshed, Leicestershire. The scenery in the neighbourhood is remarkably stern and wild; irregular masses of rock being scattered about in groups at once romantic and picturesque, while the prospects which may be seen by looking down from the hills upon the country around are truly glorious to behold. The site chosen by the new community is at the south side of an immense rock, which rises in rugged grandeur, and completely shelters the monastery from the bleak north winds. This "mount" has been called by the monks after "St. Bernard," and will shortly be surmounted by a sculptured representation of the awful scenery on Calvary; when our Saviour died a ransom for men, being "crucified with the malefactors, one on the right hand, and the other on the left." The land belonging to the abbey is naturally cold and sterile, but the unremitting labours of the "religious" have brought it into excellent cultivation. The scene to a nineteenth-century-man is certainly of the most curious; the monks, arrayed in the sombre garments of their order, may be observed working silently in the fields; but as soon as the bell rings out the hour for prayer, they immediately cease from their toil, and wherever they may be, or whatever they may be doing, they instantly fall down upon their knees and betake themselves to their devotions.

The whole of the domestic and other buildings, including the cloister, chapter-house, refectory, dormitory, calefactory, guest-house, priors' lodgings, lavatory, kitchen, offices, &c., are completed; but of the chapel only the nave has been completed. The style is early English, with massive walls, buttresses, high gables and roofs, long and narrow windows, deeply-recessed doorways, and the other characteristics of that kind of architecture, which surpasses every other for solemnity and grandeur of effect. The chapel is cruciform in plan, and, when finished, will consist of a nave and choir with aisles and transepts, with a tower and spire at the intersection. The arches of the nave spring from pillars nine feet in circumference, with foliated capitals. The framing of the roof, which is decorated with painting, is open to the view, and springs from stone corbels level with the base of the clerestory windows. The high altar will be at the east end against a reredos of arched panel-work below the triple lancets of the gable. On the eastern walls of the transepts are two altars—one to the Virgin and the other to St. Joseph. As the chapter-house adjoins the south wall of the transept, a rose window will be erected in the gable, and three large lancets on the opposite end; the sacristy is on the south side, and forms in the plan a continuation of the transept gable wall nearly as far eastward as the termination of the chapel. The stalls for the monks will be continued a considerable portion of the way down the nave, for which arrangement there are examples to be found in Westminster, Gloucester, Winchester, Tewkesbury, St. Alban's, and Norwich. The choir is bounded westward by a large and handsome stone rood-loft, occupying one bay of the nave. It is supported by three open arches (the side ones containing altars), and surmounted with appropriate painting and other enrichments. The rood itself is fifty feet high, and has images of the Blessed Virgin and St. John. By the rules of the Cistercian order the loft will be used for all its ancient purposes, and will be provided with standards for lights, and other requisite furniture.

[VOL. VII.]

INTERESTING LETTER.

FROM THE REV. DR. BACKHAUS TO HIS GRACE DR. CAREW.

London, 30th September, 1844.

MY DEAR LORD ARCHBISHOP,—Probably the most important and gratifying intelligence contained in these few lines, will be the adjoining account of His Holiness's renewed regard for the Lackersteen family and, of course, for our dear Mission. Those magnificent presents which the good Count took with him from Calcutta, as offerings of his filial devotedness to the holy Father, were left in Cairo, on our passing through Egypt to Malta. By some mismanagement or other, they were, contrary to orders, detained, and did not arrive during our stay in the Eternal City. On leaving for Florence, Monsignor Brunelli kindly promised to present them to the amiable Pontiff, as soon as they should have arrived. Whilst we were in Birmingham, despatches reached us from Rome, containing the glad tidings of the safe arrival of the articles, at their destination, of their having been presented to the Pope, of his having been highly gratified by them, and of his having, in token of gratitude, created the Count, a Knight Commander, of the Order of St. Gregory the Great. I need not tell your Grace how highly I was pleased at his new and well deserved distinction of the excellent Lackersteen family, and as I am sure, that many of the readers of our smart little Herald will participate in these my feelings, I took great delight in translating the whole despatch from its original Italian or Latin for its pages. *

Our little party has been over to Ireland. The trip was undertaken mainly for the purpose of affording the good Countess, an opportunity of visiting the amiable Dr. St. Leger and his kind brother. A necessary consequence was, that our visit was shortened as much as possible and did not exceed eight days. The time was, unfortunately, very wet, and did not permit the country to show off to advantage. Yet, notwithstanding all this, our sojourn was very pleasant. We arrived on a Thursday, and dined the same evening (viz. the Count and myself) with a select party with the Jesuit Fathers, in Upper Gardiner Street, and spent as delightful and as interesting an evening as possible. The Count was quite in raptures. The next day we drove to Clongowes College, where one of the most cordial and affectionate meetings between old friends, I ever witnessed, took place. At this noble institute, which, I was very happy to hear, is thriving admirably, we were treated with really Irish hospitality, but could remain no longer than Sunday morning, as it was rather inconvenient for the Countess to go to sleep in Clane-nunnery, a good mile off. Whilst in Kildare, we made it a point to visit the saintly Mr. and Mrs. ———, whose name tallies so well with their behaviour. On Sunday morning we drove off to Maynooth, where the talented Dr. Russell (who desired to be most kindly remembered to you) did all he could to make us pass the time comfortably and agreeably. The Count was astonished at the immense extent of the College, and the great number of its youthful inmates. On continuing in the afternoon our tour towards Dublin, we inspected, accompanied by Dr. Russell, the magnificent grounds of the Duke of Leinster, which certainly fully repay a visit to them. On Monday morning, the Count gratified one of the most ardent wishes of his life, by visiting the champion of freedom, the lately triumphant D. O'Connell. He received us in his study, wherein I was glad to see, O'Connell had determined, that religion shall not be forgotten over the allurements of sciences, or the turmoil of politics. Daniel O'Connell is not ashamed of the Cross of Christ, and the pious emblem of grace and redemption shines, the most conspicuous object in his study, over his very writing desk. He received us with that kind openness, and easy urbanity, for which he is so deservedly distinguished. Our conversation with a man having such enormous duties was necessarily short, yet very animated and appropriate. It turned chiefly upon the family of the good Lackersteens, and the affairs of India. On taking leave of this eminent man, the Count expressed a desire of having a good hearing place at the Conciliation-hall, where a general meeting was to be held the same day, at half past twelve. Upon this, Mr. O'Connell wrote immediately a small open letter to his Secretary, Mr. Ray, who had the kindness to accommodate us upon the platform, together with all the Irish patriots, so that we hardly lost a word of any speech, that was made. Long before the time appointed, this large hall was filled almost to suffocation. I was astonished to see the extensive galleries nearly breaking under the incredible crowd of ladies, that had come to participate in the glorious scene of the day. As several of the popular leaders entered, the cheering was great and continuing, especially whenever any of the traversers made their appearance; but when O'Connell came in, the cheering was so tremendous and protracted, that it beggars all description. I never saw such waving of hats, and hands, and shawls, and handkerchiefs! It seemed as if our hearing was to be destroyed. The enthusiasm of the assembly found no bounds, until O'Connell himself was, in order to proceed to business, obliged to rise, wave his hat, and command silence, and instantly there came so great a calm, that a pin might almost have been heard dropping to the ground. The honorable Mr. Hutchinson, (a Protestant,) was called to the chair. Mr. Grattan's speech was admirable, but too fiery; that of O'Connell himself, was that of a calm, calculating advocate of a great and an important cause, and of the experienced leader of a fiery, of an oppressed, and a threatened nation. His satire upon the ravagers of his fatherland, though it flows smooth as oil, yet penetrates to the very bones and marrow. This meeting, more than anything else, convinced me, that Ireland is determined to shake off the disgraceful fetters of oppression and base slavery. The sacred thirst for freedom, and for equality before the laws, pervades every state, every rank, every creed, every age, every sex, in the Isle of St. Patrick. O'Connell has made the Irish nation determined no longer to be ground down like serfs, and Father Matthew has made it capable, and worthy to be free. Liberty has become the moving spring of action in Ireland, and I fear it would be a politically dangerous experiment to attempt stopping the swelling tide of national will and indignation by the waving hand of an autocrat Prime-minister.

On Thursday, we had much pleasure in inspecting the beautiful paper-manufactory of Mr. McDonell. In this mill, paper of any given length (for miles if you please) might be made. The view of this fine machinery (producing dried paper in two minutes, from the rag-paste) is exceedingly gratifying. Mr. McDonell is the father of the Rev. F. McDonell of Gardiner-street, perhaps well known to your Grace. He is a very religious man and a great benefactor to the surrounding country. At his own expence, he maintains a school for about 80 or 100 children, over which one of his own pious daughters presides. In the evening we dined at the national banquet to O'Connell and his fellow-martyrs; the description of which you will be delighted to read in the pages of the "Freeman's Journal," which I hope Mr. — will carry with him to Calcutta. I regretted very much my having been prevented by most adverse circumstances from seeing the worthy and excellent Mr. McCann, of Castleknock; but I will certainly not miss him whenever I again visit Dublin. Mr. Dowley was unwell, and had remained in Waterford. The law for charitable bequests in Ireland, threatens to cause some disturbances but I hope, all will be satisfactorily settled. Sir Robert Peel nominated five Catholic Bishops to act as Commissioners under the said Act, but it is generally supposed, and even expected, they will not accept of it. I was glad to see, that Ireland is bestirring itself in a commercial point of view also; lines of railroads, for the length and breadth of the whole island, are contemplated and companies forming for their actual construction. The one from Dublin to Drogheda is already finished; so is the experimental one from Kingstown to Dalkey. The former it is intended to continue to Belfast; and the latter is the first atmospheric one ever constructed. It goes with astonishing rapidity up a considerable ascent, and in most surprising curves. They assert that it could go at the rate of 100 miles an hour! This little railroad is accompanied by a galvanic telegraph. Friday afternoon, previous to our embark for England, we went to see the new Loretto house at Dalkey, which is quite a fairy palace, and does great honor to the taste of Mrs. Ball, and the institute. We stopped for some days at a friend's, in Birmingham. The Catholic Church in this town is a beautiful specimen of Gothic architecture. The catholic population of Birmingham is said to be 10,000. We assisted on Sunday at High-Mass. The Church has no pews. The accomodation, which by the bye is very good, is free, and the Christian like proposition, that before the throne of our Almighty Creator there is no distinction between poor and rich, but only between the ministers of the altar and the laity, is here strictly acted upon. For want of funds, this beautiful and imposing Church (it is, in fact, one of the lions of Birmingham) is not quite finished. Of course we went round to the most remarkable manufactories of this busy and clever town. To describe all we saw, would be impossible, and to say we were delighted and astonished, is what nobody expects to be otherwise. In fact all was interesting and wonderful, but most astonishing the new (patent) process of plating by means of the Voltaic battery. To see a large vase of the most delicate, and intricate workmanship gilt in the most perfect manner imaginable in the short time of 3 or 4 seconds!!! was more than I ever expected from human ingenuity. Whilst the old method of plating, so to say, glued on the silver or gold, this one, imitating nature as it were, incorporates it with the substance it is plating. During our short stay in Birmingham, we spent one day in visiting Oscott-College, wherewith such agreeable Catholic reminiscences are connected. Dr. Wiseman received and treated us with such marks of attention and kindness, of which only a man of such great learning and such refined manners as he possesses, is capable. The worthy Prelate himself chose to be our guide over this extensive establishment, and carried us in person through the corridors, the school-rooms, the library, the chemical laboratory, the chapel, the sacristy, the different dormitories, the infirmary, the refectory, the museum, etc. etc. We were almost mortified at the excess of his lordship's condescension; when, to crown all, he insisted upon our lunching with him before our return home. Oscott College stands upon a small eminence in one of the most healthy and charming situations imaginable. It is quite a jewel of a College, and justifies any catholic heart to be proud of it. Its library is pretty extensive, well arranged and neatly kept. Among other treasures, it contains the famous discriptions of scenes in (especially) the East Indies by Colonel Forbes, 16 volumes in folio. By marriage they came into the possession of Count Montalambert, who presented them to the College. The chemical laboratory is very well conducted, the dormitories are very clean, and airy, and so healthy, as to make the offices of physician, apothecary, and infirmarian to the College, quite sinecures. The church is extremely handsome. The sacristy is rich in magnificent vestments and plate. Among other treasures Dr. W possesses a venerable relic of the great St. Thomas of Canterbury, consisting of one of the Saint's mitres and stoles. The museum contains many things very curious and interesting. Among other extraordinary objects my eye fell by chance upon one of the passports to heaven issued to one of the "elect" signed by, "Joanna Southcott." It is a rude sort of letter, containing a peremptory injunction upon the gatekeeper of heaven, to let the bearer pass straight away to the "Throne of the Lamb," as all preliminaries to that effect had been settled. On seeing such incredible extravagance, it is impossible to suppress a sigh at the awful aberrations of the Protestant mind. This Joanna evidently must have been a very illiterate woman, for her signature shews clearly, that she had hard work in scrawling her name on the paper.

Our kind Birmingham hostess (of the Church of England) accompanied us on our visit to this venerable seat of education and learning, and was so highly gratified and so much astonished at what she saw in the establishment, and what she experienced from the politeness of Dr. Wiseman, that it caused a complete revolution in her feelings and in her Protestant mode of thinking. She is a very strict Protestant and only two months ago, she deemed every thing Catholic abominable, hideous and base. Catholic priests, above all things, could be nothing less, she thought, than vile impostors, barbarians and ruffians. She was firmly persuaded that the Papists know nothing of Christ, and despise him; she could not believe that the Papists have any English Bible, until I showed her my own. As to preaching she had the (not uncommon) idea, that the Popish priests preach in Latin, to keep the people in darkness and ignorance. She was very much afraid of meeting with me, because I was a priest, and as to her meeting a Jesuit (she herself told me) she would have considered such a rash act, as putting her very life into imminent danger. I need not tell your Grace, that after all she does not think me so very bad. The more she sees of the Catholic Church the more she finds it beautiful and attractive. When lately she told her conviction to a lady of her acquaintance, the latter got into such consternation, that she ran immediately and fetched some five or six most bitter, abusive and violent tracts, as a wholesome and timely antidote to the poisonous draught of Popery she had already swallowed. But I hope all this won't do. I gave her the Imitation of Christ, and reading to her some chapters, especially the last one of the second book, it seemed to me as if her eyes filled with tears of devout consolation. At all events we have her, thank God, so far, that she has even promised me something for our poor Orphanages.

On leaving Birmingham, the Count went to Manchester, and the Countess and myself returned at once to London. The weather has been uncommonly fine, and the harvest has been one of the best on record, at least in Ireland. Only a few days ago, I was able to pay my respects to Dr. Griffiths. His Lordship is very well and active. The London mission is very prosperous and increasing under his auspices. Churches are springing up on all sides; and the one now in the course of erection in St. George's fields, is putting all the Protestant Churches of London, St. Paul's and Westminster excepted, to the blush. They say that the Nottingham Cathedral, consecrated about a month ago, is a master-piece of Mr. Pugin's skill. The whole Church is glazed with stained glass, manufactured at Newcastle.

To my most respectful regards to yourself, allow me to unite my most affectionate compliments to Dr. Olliffe, who I suppose is in Bengal prior to the arrival of these my few !!! lines. I trust in Heaven your Grace and all the dear clergy of Bengal, and especially of Calcutta, enjoy good health. I am sure you will be very glad to see, that I have nothing else to say, except that, with kindest wishes to them all, I have the honor to subscribe myself,

Your Grace's.

Most obedient Servant,

H. BACKHAUS,

Missionary Apostolic.

TRANSLATION.

MY DEAR AND REV. SIR.—Annexed to these my few lines you will find a letter, which His Holiness writes to Count John Lackersteen. Therein the Holy Father thanks the Count for his kind presents, conveying at the same time the information, of having created him Knight Commander of the Order of St. Gregory, and remitting to his address, the Insignia, and the analogous Brief.

As the Holy Father is very anxious that every thing should arrive with safety in the hands of the above mentioned Count, I beg of you to inform me as soon as possible of having received the said papers. Trusting you will do me this favor, I have the honor to sign myself,

My dear Sir,

Your very obedient Servant,

JOHN BRUNELLI,

Secy. of Prop. F.

To the Rev. Dr. H. Backhaus, Calcutta.

GREGORY XVI. POPE.

BELOVED SON, AND NOBLE SIR.—Already some time ago, we duly received the various articles, Chinese and Indian which you have kindly ordered to be presented to us. They all were in the best state of preservation. It affords us much pleasure to confess, that, on beholding them, and considering attentively their magnificence, the refined taste, the variety and perfection bestowed upon the immense workmanship, our expectations were vastly exceeded. One circumstance besides has contributed to make us prize them still higher, viz. that in one of them we see united, with admirable precision, and as it were in a picture, the long series of diversified usages of a nation so important in history, as is the Chinese. In the meanwhile, we cannot refrain from expressing to you, with sincere effusion of heart, our most unbounded gratification therewith; and we desire that thereof you should have a particular token in this our letter, wherewith we should have addressed you much sooner, could we have known with certainty, the place of your present sojourn. But that sentiment of Christian piety, which, whilst it conducted you from your distant fatherland to this metropolis of the Catholic world, for the celebration of the happily recurring last Easter solemnities, prompted you likewise to exhibit, with your aforesaid precious offering, an earnest of your filial devotion to the head of the Church in our person, is that, which on your part forms, in a special manner, the subject of our most just and agreeable satisfaction. By means of information, frequently given to the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda by the Missionaries, and the most zealous Vicar Apostolic of Calcutta, it was already known, how firmly you were adhering to, and how affectionately you respected the Holy See, and how much you render yourself daily more deserving of the Catholic religion, by every sort of liberality, in the benefiting of Churches, Schools, and other pious Institutions. Hence it has been our sovereign pleasure, that thereof you should have a new and direct approval. And although we know, that you have no other end in view, except the honor of God, the prosperity of the Church, the increase of the Catholic worship, and that you aspire to no other glory, or reward, except that, which in eternal life is prepared for real virtue, still we cannot dispense ourselves from bestowing upon your religious actions the most copious and sincere eulogiums. And as our own heartfelt inclination does not permit us to leave such great merit without a public sign of our esteem and gratitude, we have numbered you among the Commanders of our Order of St. Gregory the Great. This you will see from the Apostolic Brief, and the decoration annexed to it, which, together with this letter we have ordered to be despatched to your address, in that town, in which we were assured you would sojourn for some time. In the meanwhile praying fervently the Lord to assist you amidst the difficulties of your protracted travels, and to guide you back in safety and health to your country, to continue there the exercise of your beneficent dispositions in favor of the Church and the Catholic establishments, We impart, with paternal affection, our Apostolic blessing to yourself and your most devout consort.

Given in Rome, at St. Mary Major's, the 6th September, 1844, the 14th year of our Pontificate.

GREGORIUS, P. P. XVI.

*To our Noble and Beloved Son, John,
Count Lachersteen.*

GREGORY XVI. POPE.

BELoved SON,—Health and Apostolic Benediction. It is to us certainly very agreeable and pleasing to decorate with renown, honor and titles those men, who by the splendour of their virtue, and their uncommon actions, deserve well of civil society and the Catholic religion, and are sincerely devoted to us, and the Apostolic See. Hence, having understood, from unexceptionable testimonies, that your mind is not only adorned with peculiar gifts and virtues, that you assist with every means in your power those who in India labor in the Apostolic Missions, that you have cheerfully spent considerable sums of money, partly for extending and augmenting pious Institutes, partly in constructing new ones, and that you display extraordinary faithfulness and regard for us and the Apostolic See of Peter, on these accounts we have thought good to give you some token of our good wishes towards you. Desirous, then, to decorate you with peculiar honors, and absolving you to this effect only, and declaring you absolved from all ecclesiastical sentences and censures of excommunication, interdict or other penalties, in whatever manner or for whatever reason they may have been passed (if ever you incurred any) we elect and proclaim thee, in these present letters, by our Apostolic authority, a Knight Commander of St. Gregory the Great, of the Civil Order, and adopt you into the illustrious assemblage and number of the Knights of the same order. Wherefore we grant and impart you also permission to wear freely and duly, the Insignia of the same Order, namely a large octangular golden cross, bearing in the middle, upon a red ground, the image of St. Gregory the Great which hangs suspended on the neck by a red silk ribbon, with yellow edges. In order that you may still more be convinced of our good will towards you, we have commanded, that the same cross should be sent to you.

Given in Rome, at St. Mary Major's, under the Ring of the Fisherman, the 6th day of September, 1844, of our Pontificate, the 14th year.

(Signed.) A. CARD LAMBRUSCHINI.

*To our Beloved Son, John,
Count Lachersteen.*

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

His Grace, Dr. Carew, has requested us to tender his best thanks for five cases of valuable Clothing brought from England, by J. Spence, Esq. for our orphans. Also for twenty-four pieces of Long Cloth presented by "A Catholic," for the same benevolent purpose.

FROM BISHOP BORGHI, V. A. OF AGRA, TO ARCHBISHOP CAREW.

Lyons, 25th September, 1844

MY MOST DEAR LORD,—The day after to-morrow I will leave this, for Marseilles accompanied by my numerous Colony. The Lord has been pleased to crown my poor exertions, with good success. I need not tell your Lordship how much I have been pleased with my visit to Ireland, and in what a kind manner I was received by the Irish Clergy and gentry. I passed a few days with the Apostle of Temperance, who, as your Lordship knows, is a member of the Order to which I belong. I went to see All-Hallows College, Rathfarnham, Maynooth, and other establishments of Dublin and Cork. I am sorry to inform your Lordship, that I found the Rev. Dr. Montague dangerously ill, and I think there is little hope of his recovery. I paid also a visit to the immortal and innocent O'Connell when he was in prison, and now I rejoice with all my heart for his triumph. I pray the Almighty to bless him. Hurrah for the hero! Hurrah for the Father of his country!!!

I have obtained three Professors, and three Masters of Arts, belonging to the Congregation of St. Victor, for the Sirdhana Establishment. Three of them will direct a College for the European pupils, and the others will have the superintendence of an Orphanage, for the Native children. This new Congregation, approved of by his Holiness, is formed after the rules of the Christian brothers, with this difference, that it admits both clerical and lay brothers. This religious Institute has already many Schools, and Colleges in France, and America. The newly appointed Superior of the Sirdhana College is the late Professor of the College of Nevers, who is a good English scholar. It is the intention of the Superior General to establish, in the course of time, other schools, in the different districts of my Vicariate, and especially in the Military stations.

I think that the Catholic, as well as our liberal Protestant brethren of India, will be delighted to hear that in a short time, I will have a Convent school at Mussoorie, and that the English and French religious ladies, I have appointed for that establishment, are persons of distinguished education.

I beg to tender to your Grace my heartfelt thanks for the interest you have taken in behalf of my distressed Christians of Gwalior. I am edified to see the charity that prevails amongst our Catholic brethren of Calcutta, which extends itself to every work of mercy, without distinction of country and condition.

I trust that your worthy Coadjutor and party are safely arrived at Calcutta, and, in such a case, please my Lord, to present him my best respects. I will never forget Calcutta, nor the good and amiable friends I have there. I beg of you, my Lord, to remember me kindly to your Clergy and my numerous friends among the Laity. Pray for me that I may reach Agra with my Colony, and begin to do something for my Mission. Meanwhile I remain, most respectfully,

My most dear Lord,

Your most obdt & attached. Servt.

✠ F. J. A., Bishop.

NOTE OF THE NEW MISSIONARIES FOR AGRA.

Four Irish Clergymen, who will join my Mission next year, via Cape.

Six Capuchins from Rome, who will start in November next, via Egypt.

One Capuchin.

Three secular Priests.

Six religious brothers of St. Victor.

Sixteen Ladies of Jesus and Mary of Tourvriers

This party will accompany me to Mascilles, from whence we shall depart on the 4th of October next.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

We beg to inform our readers in town and the suburb, that on Tuesday, 3d December, at 7 o'clock A. M., there will be a Solemn Reception and Profession of some of the Ladies of the Loretto Institute. The Sermon will be preached by the Rt. Revd. Dr. Olliffe, and a Collection made for the Orphanage. To secure order and obtain aid towards the completion of the Church, Tickets of Admission, at 5 Rs. for each person, will be issued. Tickets to be had at Messrs. P. S. D' Rozario and Co.'s and at Spence's Hotel.

HOWRAH CHURCH.

We have been requested to notify that the annual Novena at the Church at Howrah will commence on Friday the 6th and conclude on Sunday the 15th proximo. The Novena Mass will be performed during the festival at half past seven.

LETTER NO. XXIV.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—In further elucidation of your rule of faith, I shall here again quote the Rev. divine whom I cited in my last, in support of yours; he says, "Doubtless, the Bible is everything, but its truths are scattered over the whole surface of a large volume, and we are not necessitated to wait in ignorance till the truths come forth, the result of our own unaided inquiries; the light which others have obtained may shine by reflection upon our path, and be a blessed guide; only it must be our business subsequently to verify and confirm by our own reading the truths to which, by our confidence in others, we have been at first directed." I intreat of you to pause here—to expand your thoughts—to enlarge your minds, and to converge, as it were, the condition of universal mankind to this specific point of your rule. I will show you, as this does, to overlook what you previously say is your fundamental rule, viz. "that you are first to examine the doctrine (by reading the Bible) and according to that to judge of the purity of the Church." Here is a wide field for your "variations;" that is, you can, as you are told elsewhere, "consistently and conscientiously agree to disagree." You can reject to-day, what you professed yesterday, or vice versa. Thus practice it, "let the light which others have obtained, shine by reflection upon the path" of the millions who are unable to read and of the thousands of the simple minded, "only it must be their business subsequently to verify and confirm by their own reading the truths to which, by their confidence in others, they have been at first directed!" This is the wisdom of your rule; upon what sort of base, my friends, do you stand and rest your salvation! Do you ascribe such a rule as this to the Holy Trinity, to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost? It is beyond all imagination preposterous; it is actually painful to dwell upon it, and almost cruel to present it thus to you in pieces; it looks so puerile, so limited, and so distorted; it would only in this form embrace the thousands and leave out the millions. It is, in fact, unworthy reasonable beings, for the powers of the mind go infinitely beyond it. It was the production of a set of spirits who found themselves hemmed in by the divine and universal injunction "hear the Church." To avoid this it was necessary to frame a rule which would prove to be its very contradistinction; it may therefore, be designated, man's spiritual folly,—But such as it is, it is yours, and therefore it is requisite to draw it out for you under every form and shape it may assume. Please however to observe that I take all my illustrations from your own authorities; they present the premises but leave out the conclusions. Above you are told, you are "not necessitated to wait till these truths—these lights come forth, the result of your unaided inquiries." You may allow them to shine as blessed guides upon your path. But, my friends, mind your rule, you can by its virtue—by its latitudinarian principles, discard "these truths," extinguish those "lights," and quit those "blessed guides" should you subsequently come to a different conclusion. As Wesley taught, you are "not to follow Bishop, Convocation, or General Council, if in opposition to your own private judgment." So the Zuinglians rejected some of the doctrines of the Lutherans, the Episcopalians of the Calvinists, the Quakers, Baptists, &c. of those and of each other down to the latest "new light," so may you as it were blow out those "lights," and abandon these "blessed guides" and produce others for yourself by the individual prerogative of your own private interpretation. You love to tell us, that "the Bible and the Bible alone is the religion of the Protestants." This is your religious motto; wonderful and extraordinary book! We all believe that you contain nothing but the word of God, yet Protestantism, by a process of its own, strikes out of you a multitude of doctrines,—what one calls "light" the other names it "darkness;" what one considers truth another deems it error; what one reckons as good another will count it as evil; what one looks upon as "blessed guides" the other views them as false teachers; thus Protestantism interprets "the Bible and the Bible alone," as a mass of contradictions, and writes this down, as the religion of Christ!! As my object is here to prove to you the absurdity and impotency of your rule, I have to beg you will bear in mind your motto, while I endeavour to bring you closer to the point, and ask you to distribute your Bible to the millions of those who are unable to read, to the savage, the unlearned, and to the dull of intellect! Shout to them "the Bible and the Bible alone is the religion of Protestants," and maintain that each individual is bound, by his own unaided examination, to extract therefrom the doctrines of Christianity,—I know you are not so foolish, yet this is strictly the maxim of your rule. Let me then hear you confess the folly, the uselessness, nay, the wickedness of it; how then in the name of everything that is consistent with reason and the wisdom of God, are you to instruct the ignorant and the vast multitude, but by that very rule which your forefathers, alas in a fatal hour, condemned and renounced, the authority of the Church—the teaching of her ministers? It is possible indeed you may struggle to meet me here, and say you will assemble the people—the ignorant, in masses; that you will profess to read the Bible to them, and dismiss them without any comment thereon, but merely direct them to make use of their own private judgment, and to judge for themselves whether the particular sect to which they may belong teaches a pure or impure doctrine. I shall not here cavil with you as to the necessity that exists of their first knowing that the book in your hand, the Bible, is really and truly the word of God,—that all the books mentioned are canonical and rightly translated, nor will I remind you to tell them that you, as a Church profess to have no more the infallible spirit of the Holy Ghost, than they may have themselves, therefore that you may possibly be in error. No, my vantage ground is too great to press this admitted obligation upon you, for such an avowal might be fatal to your assumed authority; no, but will you, I mean your ministers, thus far instruct and counsel them? No, truly, even in this shape your rule is still too preposterous and unsuitable to the state of these people,—how then do you teach them? Why, by "the authority and decision of the Church," that is, by the ministers and teachers of each sect teaching their own particular doctrines,—were not the matter so serious, it would indeed be highly amusing to us to observe how every Protestant denomination, be it high or low, mimics in some way or another the Catholic Church; follow, in truth, that "piece of Popery which they abhor." If we look, we shall see the Church of England has her "convocation" could she call it into life; the Kirk of Scotland has now her two opposite assemblies; the Methodists their "conferences," the Quakers their "meetings" and others, their fraternities, rules &c. are prescribed; but we can only see in this, downright mockery of the Church of God, and, therefore, we cannot but grieve to behold your lamentable infatuation.

Your's faithfully,

SEDGELEY PARK.—ASSOCIATED PARKERS.—This excellent society is under the patronage of the Rev. Dr. Bowdon, President of Sedgeley Park, and of six lay gentlemen of great respectability. It numbers amongst its members three of our Bishops, five Doctors of Divinity, and upwards of thirty Priests. When it is considered that for nearly a century, and through troublesome times, this excellent seminary has furnished more priests for the mission than any other in the kingdom, as well as the many thousands of respectable Catholics who have there received a sound religious education, it must be a matter of satisfaction to all who remember with affection the scene of their happy boyhood, to know that, by becoming members of this society, they may renew their intercourse with friends long lost sight of, awaken recollections the most pleasing and instructive, and at a trifling sacrifice of money and time promote very Christian and charitable objects. The annual meeting for this year is appointed to take place at Sedgeley Park, on Monday the 9th September, and will doubtless be well attended; a day replete with enjoyment to all who have the happiness to meet their old school-fellows, and to talk over by gone frolics on the very spot that witnessed them. A circular will be issued immediately after the meeting, containing the annual report of the funds of the society and a list of the additional members who have, joined it since the last meeting.—Anonymous Correspondent.

SHORTWOOD, NEAR WELLS.—On the Feast of the Assumption of our Blessed Lady, High Mass was sung by the Very Rev. Mgr. Parfitt, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Ferguson and the Rev. Canon Vals, in the chapel of St. Michael, at this place. A very nice selection of music from Mozart and Webbe was effectively sung by the choir, and it is needless to say the chapel was crowded. At an early Mass several children, who had been previously instructed, made their first communion, and also two converts, who were that day received into the fold of Christ. We trust that this is only a beginning of still more happy days for the Catholic faith amidst the hills of Mendip, where we hope to see flourish once more the true religion of our Saviour.—Correspondent

WIGAN.—CONFIRMATION.—On Sunday morning last the Right Rev. Dr. Sharples, Bishop of Samaria and Coadjutor Vicar Apostolic of this district, held a confirmation in St. Mary's Chapel, when 276 young persons were confirmed in the Roman Catholic Faith. On the same afternoon the Rev. gentleman attended at St. John's Chapel, and administered the rite to upwards of 400 persons.—Preston Chronicle.

THE VERY REV. DR. MORIARTY, O.S.A.—On Friday last, 23d inst., the Very Rev. Dr. Moriarty, of (the late) St. Augustine's Church, Philadelphia, arrived in Dublin, where he was received with every mark of respect by his numerous clerical and lay friends. We were rejoiced to see this able and eloquent divine in such good health and spirits.

SCHISM IN THE PAPACY IN BAVARIA.

In the TABLET of the 27th ult. w^e offered some remarks upon a very shameless article, of the Exeter-Hall breed and species, which appeared in the June number of the Quarterly Review. Within the last few days we have received a letter dated "Munich, 16th August," which expresses a warm and cordial approbation of our remarks, and furnishes us with some additional observations that deserve the attention of our readers.

"The short answer, Sir, to the whole of this 'Schism in the Papacy' is, that it is a tissue of falsehood from beginning to end; and its very bitterness affords the clearest proof that Germany is steadily progressing in Catholicity, and farther than ever removed from fear of schism. 'The movement in Bavaria,' says the writer, 'has already created much stir throughout Germany.' True, Sir, it has; but in what way you yourself seem clearly to understand. The conduct of the noble-minded and saintly Archbishop of Cologne has done much; the able pamphlet (Athanasius) of the celebrated Görres, for the controverting of whose sound principles and invincible arguments so much money has been uselessly offered, has for ever put to rest that long-contested question; and the results exhibited in the recent conversions of the Protestant clergymen, Dr. Schleiermacher and Haas, of Munich, and numbers of others, show the direction of the movement in Germany; and this will proceed onward, notwithstanding the conduct of some unfortunately demoralised persons elsewhere in Germany, and perhaps a few in the one diocese of Bavaria. A word from the spot, Sir, from those of long-standing and high authority here, will put you in possession of realities in this locality in opposition to bigoted prejudices. A few there are in a neighbouring diocese, such as the scribe for the Review would make out the generality to be. To them, his informants and intimates, unfortunately belong the epithets 'ignorant,' 'indolent,' 'profligate; and the opposite conduct of the rest in Bavaria, and of all the younger clergy throughout all Germany, but naturally proves condemnatory of themselves. They are as insignificant as the paper they publish; their views are confined to their own little sphere, and their efforts (if they ever did or will make them) to produce a schism in the Papacy will end, like all the past, in the mere visionary wish of some bigoted scribe to an illiberal periodical. The flourishing account given by the Reviewer of Bishop Sailer partakes of an equal plenitude of veracity with the other well-authenticated statements of the long-resident and well-informed writer who was so favoured it appears, as to get a thorough knowledge of the secret sayings, doings and thoughts of Bishops; learnt the whole state of Bavaria from a small, dissatisfied, demoralised clique; who, to his mind, formed the majority of men, manners and matters; and now mounts to the throne, and becomes English interpreter to the Quarterly Review of the words and thoughts of the Bavarian Monarch."

At page 164 of the Quarterly Review, the Reviewer thus expresses himself:—"That movement in Bavaria and Western Germany, which at this moment excites the well-founded alarm of the Roman Court, may be traced principally to the zeal and abilities of the late Bishop Sailer; and hence the importance of the speech of the King of Bavaria upon the appointment of Bishop Riedel, which ended with the expression of his Majesty's hope that he should find in him a worthy successor of Bishop Sailer." Our correspondent is far from denying that such words were used by his Majesty on such an occasion—nay, he even adds that when a newly-consecrated Bishop was recently presented to him, the King addressed him with a delicate exhortation, in these words—"Sailer is a pattern for imitation." But our correspondent rather differs from the Reviewer in the meaning he affixes to these terms.

Sailer, it appears, has occupied something of the same position with regard to the new Reformers of Germany, which Fenelon occupied with regard to the Quietists of France. "The Catholics," says the Reviewer (p. 166), "have long been supported by a very powerful journal—one fully equal in ability to the Dublin Review. It does not hesitate to denounce the followers of Sailer as 'Athenianische' and it must be confessed that the tendency of part of their system is to produce religious twaddle, and to generate a race of Madame Guignons, as the school of Fenelon did in France."

Now, every one knows that Fenelon, though at one time connected with the sect of Quietists, publicly renounced the connection with the most entire humility the moment he ascertained the heretical nature of the doctrines which he, unconsciously, and they, consciously or unconsciously, had helped to propagate. If, therefore, any king or prince in France were, on the consecration of a new Bishop, to recommend him to "imitate Fenelon," it would not, we think, generally be understood as a recommendation to imitate Fenelon in the one act of his life which he had publicly and formally recanted. In the same way with Bishop Sailer. "Sailer," says our correspondent, "at first unconsciously gave somewhat of credence to the disguised representations of the disaffected; but finding out the nature of the men, and their profligate objects and morals, he bade them an eternal adieu, and adhered ever after to the cause of the virtuous and widely-spread majority. The speech of the King of Bavaria, he or they of Frankfort may interpret in their own sense to suit their prejudices; but ere many years have elapsed, the fervent spirit and sound morality of the young clergy throughout the rest of Germany, uniting with the almost unanimous body of ecclesiastics in Bavaria, will cleanse out the true Augean stable of the demoralised, without leaving the Prophet of the Quarterly victorious in his premature predictions." On the whole, therefore, we do not think the Quarterly Reviewer makes much out of the patronage of Bishop Sailer. "Imitate him" by all means! that is, "adhere closely to the Church and be her obedient son; and if, by any oversight, you should happen to be drawn in among a lot of spiritual desperadoes—wolves in sheep's clothing—be eager to renounce the connection as soon as you discover the danger of it, and return once more to the Church outwardly as you have always in your hearts partaken of her spirit and been subject to her rule. Oh yes, 'imitate Bishop Sailer' by all means." We ought to add that our readers may place full confidence in the veracity and accuracy of our correspondent.

While upon this subject we may as well occupy a few lines in completing a statement we made in our former article in contradiction to the Reviewer. The Reviewer states that "the particular law against vernacular prayers has been relaxed elsewhere, but not for the Germans;" and he cites Austria as a country in which the law has not been relaxed. We rebuked this falsehood by a short quotation from the "Austrian Encyclopædia," and by a general reference (from memory) to the Englishman Turnbull's well-known travels in Austria. We have now Turnbull before us, and in the second volume (p. 81) we have the passage to which we then alluded.

"Neither was the interference of this great sovereign (Joseph II) confined to the external order and the temporalities of the church. It extended also to its discipline, and even to its rituals; and amid the innovations introduced by him and perpetuated by his successors, no one is more remarkable than the performance of the greater portion of the services in the vernacular tongue. The mass, that peculiar sacramental and sacrificial office, which is celebrated by the priest alone in behalf of the congregation, remains in Latin; but the devotional exercises in which the people join, the prayers, litanies, and psalms, are, since the days of Joseph, all in German; and, amid the intellectual gratifications of Vienna, few perhaps are greater, than, within the solemn walls of its magnificent cathedral, to hear the swell of a thousand voices combined in offering the choral tribute of prayer and praise, in language which all, though Romanists, can understand and feel. It was in vain that the Pope remonstrated against these accumulated infractions of what was termed, against Rome, the unity of Catholic discipline and practice. It was in vain that he even undertook a journey to Vienna, for the purpose of personal conference. The Emperor received his venerable guest with every mark of deferential reverence. He lodged him in the palace, and passed with him a portion of each day in the courtesies of conversational intercourse; but he ever declined discussions on the objects of the Pontiff's visit; and His Holiness returned to Rome without having effected the slightest impression on the mind or the decisions of his imperial host."

"Like the subjects, however, of other ardent theorists, whose sanguine temperament has outrun the bounds of practical wisdom, every one of the innovations of Joseph, both in Hungary and in Germany, were doomed to be repealed, even by himself before his decease—with the exception only of those which related to the church. These have been confirmed by the lapse of years, for they were effected in unison with the feelings of the public. They have worked great and substantial benefits; and, above all, his celebrated "Toleration Edict," which still forms the constitutional code of all the Non-Romish subjects of the empire (exclusive of Hungary), is an imperishable monument of his liberality of sentiments and of his statesman-like wisdom."—Tablet, Aug. 31.

ON TRADITION.

Besides the Canonicy and Divine Inspiration of Holy Scripture and the dogmatical sense and interpretation thereof, there are many other questions of the utmost importance to Salvation, which cannot be determined without the aid of Divine and Dogmatical Tradition. Even among the doctrines of the Anglican Church, there are several which are not read in Scripture, nor may be proved (at least with certainty of divine faith) thereby, which, nevertheless, are to be required of every man, that they should be believed as articles of the faith, and be thought requisite or necessary to salvation. The worthies of that establishment profess to hold, that the Baptism of young children is in any wise to be retained in the Church, as most agreeable with the institution of Christ. (Article xxvii.) Yet on the subject of infant-baptism Holy Scripture is wonderfully silent. The doctrine that such baptism is valid is neither read therein, nor may be proved thereby, at least on Protestant principles. Of this the Anabaptists take good care to remind their Church of England brethren. A Divine of that section of the Reformers may, it is true, quote in support of his position the reply of Christ to Nicodemus—"Amen, amen I say to you, unless a man be born again of water and the Holy Ghost, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God"—(John, III. 5)—and argue that the words are general, (as is clear more especially from the original Greek, and the Latin vulgate) and, therefore, include even infants, for whom, as well as for those who stepped into the world before them, the Sacrament of Baptism was instituted. The Anabaptists, in reply, will charge him with gross and wilful inconsistency, in holding that a Sacrament, the pledge or sign of regeneration obtained by faith (or confidence in the divine promises, "whereby faith is confirmed") could be validly received by those who are incapable of stipulating any thing on their own part, or of apprehending by faith the mercies of God offered to them therein.* He will then affirm a parity between the passage above cited and that other declaration of our Saviour—"Amen, amen, I say unto you: Except you eat the flesh of the son of man, and drink his blood, you shall not have life in you," (John, vi. 54.) and contend, that as in this latter passage a precept is contained, so also the former involves a command, and that, since all are agreed that the latter text regards those only who have attained the use of reason, it is preposterous to include infants in the former. In vain will the

* The Madras Branch of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge has been at the expense of reprinting, for the instruction of the Benighted, a small Pamphlet, entitled—"A serious Caution against the dangerous errors of the Anabaptists, by the late Right Rev. Lewis Bagot D. D., Lord Bishop of St. Asaph." From a copy now before us we have quoted, nearly verbatim, the above objection, which, with some others, the Right Rev. Prelate has had the candour (if such it can be called) to set forth in a manner, and with a boldness, which would lead the reader to expect from him some satisfactory solution of the difficulty. On this one important point, however he is silent: his silence cannot but prove a triumph to those the baneful influence of whose errors he was endeavouring to counteract. His Lordship's Tract has consequently proved a failure. "Parturiunt Montes, nascitur ridiculus mus." (Horace.)

Churchman attempt to combat these arguments on his own principles. The dangerous errors of the Anabaptist are the natural and legitimate consequences of the Protestant doctrine of justification by faith only. For if no man can be renovated in the Holy Ghost, if, to use the language of Reform, the justice wherewith Christ is just cannot be drawn over man's soul, as a curtain over a picture, except by faith, (or confidence in God's promises,) how can infants, who are incapable of making an act of faith, be justified hereby, or receive validly the pledge or sign hereof? No human being can make an act either of Catholic or Protestant faith, until the age of reason. All, therefore, who die before that period, must either be justified, not by faith only, but by some other reasonable and salutary medium provided by the Divine mercy in which the Protestant principle is false at least in their regard—or God, who wishes all men to be saved, must have done nothing for them—in their regard he is the author of a solemn deception, of a pledge or sign which death falsifies—Infant-baptism is a mockery, which at the moment of administration does the receiver no good, and yet cannot be reiterated—and the errors of the Anabaptist are as conformable to truth, as their reasoning is sound and logical. Neither of these alternatives suit the taste of the Anglican. The latter he abhors, and with justice, because full of abomination and blasphemy against Heaven,—the former he equally detests, because too Papistical, involving necessarily the belief in a Sacrament whereby, in virtue of divine institution, grace is infused into the soul of every one who places no opposition thereunto. He retains the doctrine and practice of Infant-Baptism without being able to render to his adversary a reason of his hope. The charge of inconsistency he cannot meet, and, should he venture on advancing any interpretation of those texts or attempt to quote Scripture more copiously in support of his views, the private judgment of his adversary will see nothing therein conclusive, nothing bearing satisfactorily on the question at issue between them.

In these perplexities, we, happily, are not involved. Taking the sacred volume of Holy Scripture, and with it the unwritten word testifying to us the faith of ages, as explained and interpreted by an Infallible Church, we are taught to believe that Infant Baptism is valid—that without it the new-born babes cannot attain Salvation—but that unto them, as well as unto those of other years, it is a laver of regeneration and renovation of the Holy Ghost, whereby, according to the divine mercy, we are to obtain Salvation. Our system of belief, far from involving inconsistency, bears upon it the impress of simplicity and truth, whilst the motives of our faith, and the arguments we adduce in support of the same which is in us, are at once convincing and answerable.

With regard to the validity of Baptism conferred by heretics, Protestants seem to agree with their sharp hits at the Dissenters on this subject refer, in all probability, to the lawfulness, rather than to the validity of the act. One thing however, is certain, although in the exuberance of their charity, Anglicans often have the civility to term us Idolaters, they nevertheless, hold our Baptism good to all intents and purposes. This is so true, that, at least in the opinion of a certain Rev. Chaplain of the Establishment residing not quite six miles from the flock confided to his care, whose discourses are sometimes seasoned with No-Popery effusions, and whose ministerial piety has been cast in the same mould, Baptism administered in Ireland by a Priest, and the non-commission of suicide are sufficient to entitle a dead man to what Protestants call Christian burial, in St. Mary's Burial Ground. Now we would respectfully ask our Brethren of the Church of England, is the validity of Baptism administered by heretics or Idolaters read in Scripture, or can it be proved thereby? How would they answer St. Cyprian and the Bishops who erred with him on this point? Pope St. Stephen replied by an appeal to Tradition—and ordered that the faith and practice of the Church, to which it bears testimony, should be inviolably followed. They would, perhaps, quote the Bible “by her Majesty's special command appointed to be read in churches.” We opine that St. Cyprian would there prove an over-match for them.

In the Council held at Jerusalem, (and over which St. Peter presided,) to decide the question touching the obligation of the Gentiles to observe the Jewish Laws, it was decreed “to lay no farther burden upon the Faithful than these necessary things. That they abstain from things sacrificed to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication.” (Acts xv. 28, 29.)

validly baptize, provided he apply the matter and form of that Holy Sacrament in a proper manner, and with the intention at least of doing what the Church does. Do Churchmen apply the matter of Baptism in a proper manner? In the Book of Common Prayer they are told to dip the person to be baptized in the water or to pour water upon him. Is this Rubric complied with? It is a melancholy fact that owing to the ever to be lamented prevalence amongst Anglicans of Calvinistic notions regarding the necessity of Baptism to Salvation, as also to their conviction as Protestants, that faith can be excited in the minds of the receiver of that Sacrament and of all others present at its administration, as well without dipping or pouring as with it, very many of these Rev. Gentlemen content themselves with merely dipping their finger in water and filipping it over the person they are baptizing. It is very probable that in these cases the water does not reach the person's head at all, or if it does, that the head is merely damped thereby, that there is no flowing of water, and consequently no ablution, no baptism. Against this precipitous abuse, subversive, even in true Anglican principles, of the eternal Salvation of so many souls, the more Orthodox among the Lords spiritual of the United Kingdom did not fail to raise their voice, we fear, with little fruit. To provide at once both against the profanation of a Sacrament which cannot be reiterated without Sacrilege and for the spiritual welfare of those who renounce the errors of Protestantism and embrace the faith and communion of the Catholic Church, it is usual to administer Baptism to them conditionally. Those for whom Catholicity has, unhappily, no charms should, at least, look to the eternal interests of their children, and entrust them not to the ministerial care of those, who, in this respect are false prophets, “who come to them in the clothing of sheep, but inwardly they are ravening wolves.” (Matt. vii. 15.)

It is a doctrine of the Catholic Church that every human being, who has attained the use of reason, no matter whether he be Catholic or Heretic, Jew or Infidel, can

This precept is recorded in Scripture, its obligation may be proved thereby. Are Christians at the present day bound by its provisions as regards abstinence from blood and from things strangled? Are Anglicans scrupulous in its observance? Do they never use the blood of sheep, oxen, &c., in their various dishes? Do they use no other animal food, save that out of which the blood had been first allowed to flow? We opine they must answer all these questions in the negative. They will, no doubt, tell us that the precept in question was merely an Apostolical and Ecclesiastical ordinance which the circumstances of the infant Church rendered necessary—which continued in force, at least in some places, even to the time of Bede, but which is long since abrogated. This is a good Catholic answer—such a one precisely as we would give if questioned on the matter. But the men whose faith and morality must be read in Scripture and proved thereby, and the rule of whose belief and practice is (or at least should be, according to their own principles) nothing more nor less than the Bible, should be called on to produce the chapter and verse of that sacred volume, wherein the revocation or repeal of the mandate in question is contained. If they fail in this, as they inevitably must, let them either acknowledge with contrition their past prevarication, and for the future regulate their conduct according to the injunction of the Apostles, or else renounce at once all belief in the 6th of the 39 Articles, rejecting it as false and erroneous, and admitting and embracing most steadfastly divine and dogmatical Tradition.—Madras Catholic Expositor.

PILGRIMS OF MARYLAND.

Before it had passed through the necessary forms, Lord Baltimore died in London, on the 15th of April, 1632, in the 53d year of his age; lying buried (says Fuller) in the chancel of St. Dunstan's in the west, leaving his son, the Right Hon. Cecil Calvert, heir to his honor, estate and noble disposition. He has left a character worthy of all admiration. For wisdom, justice and virtue, for heroism, perseverance and fidelity, for sobriety, moderation and charity he has been rarely equalled and never surpassed. The writers of his own time speak of him unanimously in the most exalted language. Fuller (a Protestant divine in 1660) says that "he was of rare virtue, for that when he became a Roman Catholic he at once resigned the chief secretaryship which he had filled so well; finding that he must either be wanting in his trust or violate his conscience in discharging the office." Loyd, a writer of about the same period, declares that "his public spirit consulted not his private profit, but the enlargement of Christianity and the king's dominions in that his ancient, primitive and heroic work of planting the world." "Though he was a Catholic, yet kept he himself sincere and disengaged from all interests, and though a man of great judgment, yet not obstinate in his sentiments, but taking as great pleasure in hearing others' opinions as in delivering his own while he heard, moderated and censured."

"He carried a digested and exact account of affairs to his master every night, and took to himself the pains to examine the letters which related to any interest that might be any ways considerable. He was the only statesman that, being engaged to a decayed party, yet managed his business with that high respect for all sides, that all who knew him applauded him, and none that had any thing to do with him complained of him."

"He was freedom's champion; one of those,

The few in number, who had not a serpent

The charter to castrate which she bestows

On such as wield her weapons. He had kept

The whiteness of his soul, and thus men o'er him wept."

* But it is not our task to write the eulogy of Calvert. Ages since it was indelibly inscribed by, more, in mortal power on the walls of the Eternal temple, that temple wherein, now and for ever, are assembled that glorious army of sufferers, whose passport to Paradise was written with their blood or heard in their sighs, who have shed lustre even on those black pages of English history which record their persecutions.

The name of Cecil, the eldest son and heir, was substituted for George in the patent, and the grant was fully completed on the 20th of June, 1632, not however without remonstrance from the agents of Virginia who endeavored, unsuccessfully, to convince the Privy Council that the territory of that colony was invaded by the boundaries affixed to Maryland. The second Baltimore seems to have inherited with his title and fortunes all his father's virtues, talents and designs, though he lacked that bold heroism which distinguished him. The one only planned, the other could both plan and execute. As soon as the grant was confirmed he commenced preparations for the settlement of the colony. Remaining in England himself, the care of the transportation and settlement of emigrants was confided to his brother Leonard, who was endowed with all the powers necessary for the performance of the trust. As the great object was to provide a refuge from persecution for those of the faith then proscribed in England, the original emigrants were Catholics. Unfortunate at home they sought a spot in which they could embrace the altar, and find an inviolable refuge from the fury of the wicked and the merciles. They hastened to a soil consecrated to Freedom in the name of Religion. On Saint Cecilia's day in the year 1633, they sailed with a gentle but favorable gale from the Isle of Wight, to the number of about two hundred, mostly gentlemen of standing and substance. Their vessels were two in number, a small pinnacle of forty tons, and a ship of four hundred, called the Ark and Dove, a name emblematical of the peaceful means by which they sought security for conscience even to banishment. As they sailed smoothly and tranquilly, with sails expanded, like the white wings of the bird of hope, from home and kindred to the wilderness and savages, who, recollecting their motives, will hesitate acknowledge that they must have felt the true martyr spirit. There are martyrs who neither burn nor bleed, but suffer a thousand deaths in the prolongation of one life. Their sufferings are not the less glorious because they lack the dramatic heroism of those, the grandeur of whose character is concentrated in the final scene. The pilgrims of Maryland furnished victims of both classes. The holy offering of patience and suffering for America, commenced on the day when to the winds and waves were committed our band of emigrants. On board the ship were several Jesuits. Where is the spot on earth's surface, however difficult of access or dangerous of habitation, to which these indefatigable messengers of mercy, these zealous and accurate scholars, have not penetrated! After a long and tempestuous voyage, having stopped at Barbadoes, St. Christopher's and Point Comfort, they finally arrived in March, 1634, at their destined homes. Following the example of Columbus, or rather obeying their own pious promptings, they immediately erected a cross and returned thanks to God for their safety. They purchased from the Indians the necessary land for their present purposes, and founded the town of St. Mary's, which, although it continued to be the capital for seventy years, is now levelled with the dust. Having arrived in the spring and bought the crop of corn then planted in the vicinity of St. Mary's, they were soon able to reap a harvest which secured them from want. Neither the ladies nor their servants had ever before seen the maize of this country, and were ignorant of the process by which the shining and brittle grains were converted into bread. They were soon instructed by the good-natured squaws, and so well taught, that even to this day (as no doubt some of us can attest from personal experience) the corn-bread, hoe-cakes, johnny-cakes and slap-jacks of their successors are a savory nutriment not to be despised.

Time will not permit us to pursue in detail the history of the colony. Let us glance at its salient points, and we shall find that Maryland is the "bright particular star" of colonial history; that the justice, intrepidity, virtue, humanity toleration and above all the ardent love of liberty which her founders exhibited, far surpassed what can be elsewhere found. While the sobriety and justice of the Quakers in Pennsylvania, the independence and enterprise of the Puritans in New England, the industry and perseverance of the Hollanders in New York, and the gallantry, both in love and war, of the Cavaliers in Virginia, have found historians to record and poets to sing their praises, let us contemplate the purified concentration of all in the acts of those who first planted civilization on the shores of the Chesapeake. Their justice—the right of conquest by which the weaker become the prey of the stronger is fully asserted by the law writers. It is the foundation of the royal title in England from the time of William I. It has been recognised by grants in this country and by the decisions of our courts. This doctrine supposed that when a country was overrun and its inhabitants subdued, the law of nature and nations vested in the victors, the sovereign power which had before existed in the Aborigines, a doctrine abhorrent to every sentiment of natural justice and utterly repudiated by the proprietary of Maryland. Not an inch of her soil was wrung by force from unoffending weakness; not one spot was stained by the blood of innocence to gratify the lust of dominion. The governmental power was derived from their sovereign, but their land titles by conveyance from the lawful owners, and their settlement was made with the full consent of the natives.

MISCELLANEA.

BIRTH At Wai-Mate, on the 20th of May, the wife of the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of New Zealand, of a son.

The Archbishop of Canterbury and heads of the Church of England, seem determined to make up for their want of success at home, in stopping the rapid progress of preachers of dissent.—Methodists, Junipers, Ranters, Southcotites, bearded Prophets, latter-day Saints, White Quakers, Socialists, and an hundred others, besides the opponents of all religion, who lecture on chairs and tables, in the Regent's-park and elsewhere, every Sunday. Our Canterbury Metropolitan, it seems, unable to make any impression on Christians, by Bishops, (there are 28 in England)—seems determined to make amends, by trying what Bishops can effect upon Pagans, Mahometans, and Jews; and therefore sends one each to New Zealand—to Jerusalem—to Hong Kong. We expect next to hear of the Protestant Bishops of Ispahan, and Constantinople, and no doubt we shall of Peking; that is, provided the sine qua non—the indispensable £2,000 a year can be raised by some pious king, like him of Prussia, if Sir Robert Peel should be inexorable. Apropos as to this birth of the young New Zealand Bishop—it reminds us of a story we heard. When Dr. Alexander, (the quondam Israelite) was going to take possession of his see, as successor of St. James the less, it is said he went on landing, to a hotel kept by an Italian, and amid the endless luggage—the trunks, chests, cases, portmanteaus, bandboxes, &c. &c. &c., and all the male and female servants, Signor Il Vescovo (the Lord Bishop) was announced; then Signora la Vescova—this made the Italians stare; but when a whole group of children appeared, "Santa Maria!" exclaimed a maid servant in amazement—"Ecco i Vescovini!" (Holy Mary! see all the little Bishops!)—Sydney Morning Chronicle.

The Rev. T. J. O'Connell, late of Waterford who has just returned from Rome, preached on Sunday last, in the church of St. Teresa, Clarendon street, in favour of the Widow's House, Clarke's court, which was numerous and respectably attended.—Correspondent. We learn from good authority that Dr. O'Connell purposes treating the opinions of the Tractarians, and particularly those of the Rev. Mr. Hall, in his late work on Purgatory. In Mr. Hall's book there is much apparent research, and as he cites at great length passages from the Greek and Latin Fathers, by misapplication, misconstruction, or other omissions, in support of his anti-Catholic theory, the work to which we allude must be of considerable importance at this moment, as a conscientious and laborious investigation of the Fathers on this dogma, which is the last entrenchment of the Tractarians, will place the genuine doctrine of the primitive Church in its true light. The letter of Dr. O'Connell on Transubstantiation, addressed last year to Dr. Pusey, has given an evidence of his accuracy and learning in a controversy of this nature, whilst his talents and temper render him extremely interesting.—Tablet.

DEATH OF THE VERY REV. DR. M'CONVILLE.—Died, at the parochial house, Dromore, on the 16th inst. after a few weeks' illness, the Very Rev. Dr. M'Conville, V. G. of the diocese of Dromore, and for twenty-two years the respected parish priest of the united parishes of Dromore and Carvaghey. This highly-gifted and esteemed clergyman was in the 63d year of his age, and the 36th of his ministry. He was a zealous and faithful minister. He was pious, charitable, benevolent and humane; mild and gentlemanly in his manners, conciliatory in his conduct, and a living exemplification of the lessons he taught. He won the esteem of all classes in society, and gained for his memory that unfeigned respect which the virtuous and exemplary life cannot fail to ensure. The diocese of Dromore has in his death sustained a heavy loss. His parishioners will long remember the invaluable services he rendered them in the erection of their chapels and schoolhouses besides a handsome parochial house, which he built at his own expense. His ministerial career was distinguished by uniform piety and zeal, particularly in training up the little ones, whom he loved, and in return was beloved by them. His remains were interred, on Thursday last, in the chapel of Dromore, which was crowded to excess from an early hour that morning. One universal feeling of unaffected sorrow and regret for the loss of their revered pastor seemed to pervade all present, the respectable members of the different religious denominations seemed to share the same feeling in common. After the solemn office for the dead had been chanted, by the Right Rev. Dr. Blake, and almost the whole of the Catholic clergy of the diocese of Dromore, the Rev. L. L. Morgun, assisted by the Rev. B. O'Loughlin and J. Macken, as deacon and sub-deacon, and the Rev. John Sharkey as master of the ceremonies, celebrated a requiem Pontifical High Mass; at the conclusion of which, the Right Rev. Dr. Blake delivered a most appropriate discourse, in which he took a view of the duties and laborious life of a good pastor, and in a happy strain of impressive eloquence drew so good a likeness that an attentive and deeply affected audience did not fail to recognise in it the zeal and many virtues that adorned the exemplary and edifying life of the Very Rev. Dr. M'Conville.—Northern Whip.

DEATH OF EDMOND IGNATIUS RICE.—The Waterford papers announce the death of a venerable, a good, and, in the best sense of the word, a great man—a man of powerful mind—of vast knowledge of human nature—of a comprehensive grasp of intellect—of undaunted courage—of irresistible perseverance—of unbending integrity—of pure piety—of immense charity—Edmond Rice, the founder of Christian Schools—the herald of a new age to Irishmen in the way of instruction—the harbinger of virtue and of blessings—the benefactor of his species, not only in Ireland, but in whatever quarter of the globe the present generation of the humbler classes of our fellow-countrymen have penetrated, because to Mr. Rice is mainly attributable the credit of whatever intellectual training they enjoy.—Tablet.

The Right Rev. Dr. Foran has ordered a Month's Mind for the late Dr. Rice, founder of the Christian Brother's Society, to be observed in Waterford on the 1st of October.—Ibid.

INDIA.—Mgr. Borghi, Bishop of Agra and Vicar-Apostolic of Thibet, has returned to Lyons from England, and is preparing to start for Bengal, where he is charged to open two new missions; one in Lahore, and the other in the mountains of Cashmere. He brings with him a sufficiently numerous colony of Missionaries, belonging to various nations, seven Brothers of St. Victor, and several religious ladies, to found schools.—Ibid.

GIBRALTAR.—We expect Monsignor Capacini, the Pope's Nuncio at Lisbon, here in a few days, on his return to Rome. He will leave Lisbon with the English packet on the 17th inst. Very elegant apartments are prepared for him in the residence of Sir Leonard Aquarone, the Roman Consul.—Ibid.

TRINIDAD.—By the last packet I learn that the Solicitor General of the port of Spain, or Trinidad, has introduced into the Local Legislature a bill, or statute, which is to have for its object the making of the Protestant Church of England the established Church of that colony! Nothing, perhaps, has ever been introduced by the nominees of the British Government into this part of its dependency so unpopular, or so outrageous, as this Church ascendancy project, and that in a country almost exclusively Catholic. Already petitions have been pouring in from all quarters against this most nefarious measure. And this is the Government which is anxious to take charge of our charitable bequests. Mercy on us, what urbanity and condescension!—Our Dublin Correspondent.

TALLOW.—On Monday the Right Rev. Dr. Foran, finished the triennial Visitation of the district of Dungarvan. In this parish his lordship administered the Sacrament of Confirmation to over seven hundred persons, making a total of over ten thousand in this small district of thirteen parishes—a very extraordinary instance of the increase of the population in this part of the country. We witness, with sincere satisfaction, the zealous exertions of this good and enlightened prelate in the discharge of the many duties of his high calling, of almost daily occurrence. On Sunday morning his lordship was engaged in the performance of the solemn ceremony of the religious profession of a young lady, Miss Margaret S. Condon, in the Carmelite Convent of this town. On this joyous occasion to her friends, over three hundred children were entertained at a public breakfast in the school-rooms of the Convent, and this number is considerably under the average attendance of those who receive useful and religious education in these schools. After breakfast was over, his lordship visited the rooms, addressed the children, and examined them for their Confirmation on the next day. — Waterford Chronicle.

CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 23.]

RELIGIOUS PROFESSION.

The interesting ceremony of a profession of six Novices, and a reception of three Postulants was performed last Tuesday in St. Thomas' Church. His Grace the Archbishop officiated, assisted by Rev. Messrs. Duvelier and Kenny. On the Epistle side of the altar an elevated seat was prepared for the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe, who was attended by the Very Rev. Dr. Kennedy, and Rev. Mr. Formosa. After the reception, his Lordship ascended the pulpit, and delivered a sermon, (in which a brief description of the ceremony is given) of which the following is an outline :—

More blessed shall she be, if she so remain, according to my counsel; and I think that I also have the spirit of God.

(I. Cor, 7, 40.)

"Were I to inform you, beloved brethren, that a certain class of persons was long the object of admiration in the universe; that the most powerful monarchs, both for heathenism and Christendom, have been struck with reverential awe at beholding them; that they have not hesitated to bend their haughty heads in token of respect for them; that captives have been liberated from their chains, on one of them being seen pass by; that Emperors have not only entertained them, but ministered to them with delight at their hospitable boards; were I to mention these and many other prerogatives, with which that class has been honored by the first people of the universe; you, undoubtedly, would ask me with eagerness to whom I alluded. And I presume that, when I satisfy your enquiry, your astonishment will be equally great, on learning that those persons belong to a class, which is, at present, far from being the happiest in the estimation of the world, and which holds a position by no means enviable in the opinion of our separated brethren. That class consists of those, who renounce the pleasures of the senses, and preserve immaculate that purity of mind and body, which is so acceptable in the sight of their Redeemer, who is himself a Virgin. Yes, it was this class that received so many privileges from royalty in the reign of heathenism, as well as in the Christian dispensation. The Vestal virgins of pagan Rome, though far inferior in many respects to the religious of the Christian metropolis, were ever treated with marked reverence by Consuls and by Emperors; and as to Christian virgins, we are informed by that veracious historian Eusebius, that the great Constantine himself entertained for them so high a respect, that he appeared to adore them; and his imperial mother, St. Helen, while visiting the holy places, which had been consecrated by the life and sufferings of the man-God, did not hesitate to minister unto them with her own royal hands. But why such honors? why such distinctions? Because it is indeed a matter of astonishment, that creatures of a frail and delicate frame, surrounded by the allurements of the world, to the enjoyment of which everything that is in it attracts them, should contemn those allurements, should trample them under foot, and should, like Moses, prefer the "reproach of Christ," and the opprobrium of the Cross to the "treasures of the Egyptians," and the pleasures of Pharaoh's palace. Nay, by the most learned men of the Church, such as the mellifluous Abbot of Clairvaux, they are ranked in a higher scale of dignity than the angels themselves, not because the latter are not gifted with brighter purity; but because they have not the same difficulties to encounter in the preservation of that purity, they are not encumbered with a fleshy carcase, which might weigh them down to the earth, and impede their advancement in virtue; while the former are beset with all these difficulties, and are, therefore, doubtless more to be admired. In the same manner as the snow, which has preserved uncontaminated in a valley its original whiteness and beauty, should much more attract our attention, and excite our admiration, than the other snow which is undefiled indeed, and unsullied, but on the summit of a mountain."

His Lordship then proceeded to refute the charges made by Protestants on our Church for sanctioning the religious state, and requiring the observance of perpetual continency from those who embrace it, or who devote themselves to the sacred ministry. He first said that the Catholic Church, so far from holding Matrimony in disrepute, or considering it a dishonorable state, teaches that it was not only instituted by the Almighty as a civil contract in the earthly Paradise, but also was elevated by our Redeemer to the dignity of a sacrament, and thus constituted a symbol of that spiritual union which exists between Christ and his Church. Further, he maintained that the Catholic Church entertains much more respect for matrimony than the Protestant, because she expressly commands her children not to presume to enter into it in the state of sin, but previously to purify their souls from every stain, and denounces the refractory as guilty of sacrilege, of profaning namely an ordinance consecrated by the Lord, while the Protestant Church, on the contrary, issues no such commands to her children, but at least tacitly permits them to engage in that holy state, with the filth of sin upon their souls, as in many cases, sins, at least of thought, precede the celebration of marriage.

Dr. Olliffe next proved that Celibacy, or the unmarried state, is more perfect than matrimony. For this purpose he quoted several passages from St. Paul, from the same chapter and Epistle, from which he had taken his text. These were v. 7, "I would that all men were even as myself;" v. 8, "I say to the unmarried and to the widows, it is good for them if they so continue, even as I;" v. 32, "He that is without a wife is solicitous for the things that belong to the Lord; but he that is with a wife is solicitous for the things of the world;" v. 34, "The unmarried woman and the virgin thinketh on the things of the Lord... but she that is married thinketh on the things of the world;" v. 38, "He that giveth his virgin in marriage doth well, but he that giveth her not, doth BETTER;" and v. 40, "More blessed shall she be, if she so (unmarried) remain, &c." as in the text. From all these passages he drew the incontestible argument, that St. Paul considered celibacy or the unmarried state, more perfect than the married.

He then absolutely denied that the Catholic Church sanctions the compulsion of females to embrace the religious state. The Council of Trent on the contrary (Sess. 25. ch. 18,) anathematizes those, of whatsoever station or rank they may be, who should compel any female to embrace the religious state! He then asked, why should they be prevented from doing so, if they consider themselves called to it by God, and if they be persuaded that they can more feebly work out their salvation in a convent than in the world, which, according to St. John, "is all seated in wickedness," (1 John, 5, 19.)

He then briefly described the ceremony of the day. He said that of the nine females who presented themselves before the altar, three were candidates for the religious state, and therefore had received the white veil, which is a symbol of the noviciate, a state of probation that lasts two years, before they are perpetually admitted. They had already been tried for several months before the receiving even of the white veil. The other six had now completed those two trials, before and after the taking of the white veil, and had been two years and a half in the convent during all which time they had enjoyed perfect liberty to return to the world, if they pleased. Their hair was cut off, to indicate that they had renounced the superfluities and vanities of the world. They received a cincture or girdle, as a symbol of the continency, to which they pledged themselves a symbol alluded to by our Saviour in these words: "Let your loins be girt, &c." (Luk 12, 35.) He then adverted to the circumstance of the ceremony taking place on the festival of St. Francis Xavier, and feebly added that his spirit seemed to hover over this Mission, if we may judge from the glorious enterprises of its present distinguished Chief Pastor, and then concluded by addressing the nine candidates in the following or similar terms:—

"Yes, spouses elect of Jesus Christ, St. Xavier were to return to this country, and to enter this temple to-day, he would rejoice at beholding you treading in his footsteps and labouring like him for the glory of your Maker, and the sanctification of your fellow creatures. For you, like him, are about to renounce the world, with its vanities and sinful enjoyments, and to nail yourself to the cross of Christ, using for nails the three vows of Poverty, of Chastity, and Obedience, which you intend offering today to your Redeemer. Oh! happy you if you persevere in this solemn engagement! happy you, if like Xavier, you be faithful to your divine Spouse unto death. Beware five foolish virgins of the neglected to keep their lamps, and were on that account the Bridegroom, and locked the nuptial chamber. Take heed, contrary, as St. Peter admonishes your good works, to make sure of election." (2 Pet. 1, 10.)

... thus merit to be enrolled among the chosen band, which alone is privileged in singing the canticle, that contains the praises of the Lamb, who is himself a Virgin, and you will follow him, whithersoever he goeth; in the pleasure grounds of Paradise, for ages of ages."

THE HOWRAH CHURCH.

On next Saturday evening, the 14th inst. Vespers will commence at the Howrah Church at 6 o'clock, and on the following day, Sunday, at 10 o'clock, the Right Revd. Bishop Olliffe will celebrate Pontifical Mass—a Sermon in English will be preached by Mr. James A. Treacy, after which a collection will be made to defray the expenses of the Church.

DWARKANAUTH TAGORE.

The Catholic Community owe a large debt of gratitude to Dwarkanauth Tagore, Esq. not only for his generous contributions to their charitable Institutions, but still more for the kind manner in which they are conferred, and the sincere admiration with which he always speaks of the venerable Pontiff, who now fills St. Peter's chair. We are convinced, that his liberal and manly conduct with Protestants, when talking with them of his interview with His Holiness, has done much towards removing their prejudices, and has created a favorable feeling in many of them, towards their Catholic brethren. In addition to his other benefactions, we have earned, with pleasure and gratitude, that Dwarkanauth has promised to present a valuable public Clock, to be erected in the temple of St. Thomas' Church, Chowringhee. By this noble act of judicious liberality, Dwarkanauth will, besides giving a magnificent present to St. Thomas' Church, render also a great public service to the numerous, and highly respectable inhabitants of that part of Calcutta. We regret much to learn, from the following letter, which was accompanied with a donation of one hundred Rupees for our Orphanage, that the health of this great and generous Benefactor to our community continues in a delicate state, and we are confident that our brethren will all join in the earnest and grateful prayer to God, that he may be soon restored to the enjoyment of vigorous and permanent health.

W. R. Lackersteen, Esq.

MY DEAR SIR,—I am very much obliged to His Grace, the Archbishop, for sending the tickets through you. Pray tell him that I very much wish to attend the ceremony, but I am afraid, from the state of my health, and the early hour, I shall not be able to attend. However, I beg to enclose an order for Co.'s Rupees one hundred, as my contribution to the funds for the Orphanage, and, with my best compliments to His Grace, believe me, 1st Dec. 1844.

Yours very truly,
D. TAGORE.

MOOTECHAREE.

Interesting extract from a letter to the Archbishop, respecting the Christian population in the neighbourhood of Mootecharee.

"Champaran, of which Mootecharee is the Civil Station, not being in the Bengal Vicariate, it may not be known to your Grace, that the interesting Christian colonies of Betteah and Chooree are situated in this district. Betteah is about thirty miles from Mootecharee, and Chooree six miles beyond Betteah. The Mission in Betteah was founded by an Italian Capuchin Friar, about the year 1740, and now amounts to a congregation of eleven hundred Native Christians. There is an excellent house for the Pastor, and a large substantial Church capable of containing three hundred persons. In the small lonely village of Chooree there are about three hundred Christians. These are all descendants of a few families of Nepaulese Christians, who escaped from that country in the persecution of 1769, together with four of the Capuchin Missionaries, who had, fifty years previously, established Missions in different parts of Nepal. My official duties lead me frequently in the direction of these two places, and I take a great interest in the people. The Rev. and excellent Father who has charge of both Missions is an Italian. He is most anxious to establish a good school at Betteah, but the funds are wanting, and the people, although they cannot be said to be poor, for they are very industrious, and but few of them are in want, will not contribute to its support."

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

R. J. Loughnan, Esq. C. S. has requested the Archbishop to have him enrolled as a subscriber of twenty-five Rupees per An. to the Society for the Propagation of the Faith.

TESTIMONIAL TO CAPTAIN VOSS OF THE "SERINGAPATAM."

A piece of Plate has been presented to the Commander of the "Seringapatam," by the Right Rev. Bishop Olliffe, on behalf of the Catholics of Calcutta, for his kindness and attention to his Lordship and the Religious Party who accompanied him out in that vessel. The piece of Plate consists of a very handsome embossed silver Tankard, on a salver, richly engraved with vine leaves of the same material. The inside of the tankard is highly gilt, and the salver bears the arms of Captain Voss. The workmanship does infinite credit to Messrs. Lattey Brothers. The inscription on the tankard is as follows:

Presented To EDWARD VOSS, Esq.

by
THE RIGHT REV. DR. OLLIFFE
On the part of the Catholics of Calcutta,
For his great kindness and attention
To the Religious Party
Who accompanied the Bishop to India.
November, 1844.

We have much pleasure in subjoining Bishop Olliffe's address to Captain Voss and that gentleman's reply to his Lordship.

Calcutta, Nov. 29th, 1844.

EDWARD VOSS, Esq.,

Commander of the Ship Seringapatam.

MY DEAR CAPTAIN,—It is now full time that I should perform the pleasing task of publicly addressing you, not only in my own name, but also on behalf of the numerous party who accompanied me to India.

To say nothing of our admiration of your great skill and unwearied vigilance as a Commander, qualities which inspire even the most timid passenger with confidence, and a moral certainty of safety, I feel much pleasure in communicating to you our grateful acknowledgments for the constant attention you paid to us during our delightful passage, and for the readiness which you ever exhibited, in the most gentlemanly manner, to remove the discomforts necessarily attendant on a sea voyage of such long duration, especially with regard to the more humble portion of my party. I must not omit likewise to advert to that religious liberality which you always evinced, by throwing no obstacle in the way of the free exercise of our devotions, but, on the contrary, by affording every facility in your power to render convenient to us the performance of our public worship.

These feelings of gratitude, however, do not actuate alone myself and party, they are more strikingly perhaps, but not more sincerely evinced by several respectable Catholics of Calcutta, who have contributed to the purchase of the accompanying piece of plate, of which, in their name, I beg your acceptance. This testimonial would be more worthy of your merits, were not the other Catholics, whose means might have allowed them to come forward, prevented by the numerous demands that are made upon their bounty, for the support of our various charitable Institutions.

To your first officer, Mr Brydges, to Dr. Baillie, and to the other officers under your command, you will tender our best acknowledgments for their unvarying kindness and attention. I need not add, in conclusion, that our venerated Archbishop and his clergy fully concur with me in the sentiments of this address.

Wishing you every happiness, and a safe return to the bosom of your family,

I remain, my dear Captain,

Your sincere well-wisher,

(Signed) THOMAS OLLIFFE,
Bishop of Milene, and C. V. A. of Bengal.

Calcutta, November 29, 1844.

Bishop of Milene and C. V. A. of Bengal.

MY DEAR LORD,—I have just received your flattering address, with its accompanying testimonial, which yourself and friends have most kindly thought proper to present me with. I can assure you that this demonstration of your regard has given me much satisfaction, inasmuch as it affords me a permanent and substantial proof of the kind manner, in which you have appreciated my humble efforts to render the voyage of the Seringapatam as comfortable as it lay in my power.

You speak, my Lord, of the liberality evinced by me towards a religion different to that I have been instructed in, and it is on this very subject that I have to express my admiration of the manner in which you, as head of an Ecclesiastical party, abstained so entirely from subjects that a great portion of our passengers differed in. For this I have in an especial manner to thank you,

You also advert to the fact that your sentiments towards me are participated in by your Archbishop, his clergy, and many of your community: to these, therefore, I beg you to convey my warmest thanks.

In conclusion, let me add my best wishes for the health and happiness of yourself and those who accompanied you.

Remaining, my dear Lord,

Yours very truly,

(Signed) EDWARD VOSS.

RIGHT REV. BISHOP BORGHİ.

We have received letters from Bombay which contain the gratifying intelligence, that Sir George Arthur, the Governor, not only paid the most courteous attention to Bishop Borghi, but also most kindly promised, on the part of Government, every assistance towards the safe and speedy conveyance to Agra of the numerous missionary party, which accompanied his Lordship from Europe.

CONVENT OF ST. FRANCIS XAVIER, BOW BAZAR.

We have great pleasure in announcing that the above named most important institution will be opened to-morrow the 8th inst. the day sacred to the feast of the Immaculate Conception of the ever Blessed Virgin. On that day at 7 o'clock, A. M. there will be a solemn High Mass celebrated in the very tasteful and commodious Chapel attached to the convent. After Communion a Sermon will be preached by the Rev. Mr. Kenny of St. John's College. In the evening Vespers will be sung at 6½ o'clock, and a religious instruction given. For the future, during the cold season, the daily Mass at the Bow Bazar chapel will begin at 7 o'clock, A. M.

LETTER NO. XXV.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—In order to investigate your rule with that minuteness and care which the importance of the case demands, it is necessary to test it by every contingency of life; this will be trying it like gold in the fire; if it is merely a glittering thing made up of alloy, it will instantly, upon such a trial, show what base matter it was made up of, if again, it be genuine and pure, it will shine the brighter by undergoing such an ordeal. Suppose then we subjoin to the cases pointed out in my late letters, the condition of the poor and the daily labourer, and that we contrast their circumstances to the spirit of your rule, and which it is needless for me here to recapitulate; in real earnestness let me ask you how will the daily workman, the man-servant, the field labourer, the soldier and the sailor, the maid-servant, the mother of children, &c. find time, even admitting the most improbable hypothesis, that they are in possession of the requisite learning to make the required, and as you say indispensable inquiry, whether the books of the Bible are canonical and were written by inspiration, are correctly translated, and then to compare text to text or, as the conversion of faith directs them to do, when it says; "when there is a question about the truth and full sense of any scripture, it must be searched and known by other places that speak more clearly," this your rule enjoins them to practice. Consider here that the religion of one generation of Christians, according to your theory, can be no infallible guide or guarantee to the next age; that, like the inventions of art the doctrines of Christianity are to be left open to any changes or reformations which the inventive genius of man may suggest or establish; thus what measure of knowledge the father or mother procures, must not satisfy, agreeably to your system, the mind of the son or daughter; the sister must not be biassed by the opinion of the brother, nor the wife by that of the husband, or vice versa, but each must be directed by his or her own individual examination and private judgment; the clergy must not step in to regulate, control or confirm their opinion, for if you admit this, you adopt, "that piece of Popery, the authority of the Church, which (you say) you all abhor as most injurious to God." Picture to yourselves then the fearful precipice to which this your rule leads these poor people, and leaves them as it were blindfolded upon its very brink, groping their way. It is impossible not to look at this critical stage for the Catholic Church; the picture is too real; the situation too awful. The unenlightened soul looks out here for some object to rest her hope upon; like the mariner in a prolonged storm who anxiously longs and seeks for a sight of the sun; for a time the heavens are deeply overcast, but lo! sun-beams at last shoot their rays from a certain cloud, its edge is tinged with golden and bright colours—behind is the sun, and presently he breaks forth, and shows to the bewildered Navigator his liquid course; so does the glorious Catholic Church, "the light of nations," arise before the troubled and darkened souls of men, and so does she break, with her beautiful light through the surrounding darkness, and enlighten our way towards the eternal haven of rest. Oh! it is lovely to contemplate her spirit, and to behold how she acts; she meets the wanderers as they are going towards the beetling path; she stands there as a beacon, and will, if they will, become their guide, and direct them by that "holy, straight way, so that fools shall not err therein." For the Lord says by the mouth of his Prophet, "I will clothe her priests with salvation, and her saints shall rejoice with exceeding great joy." It is in meditating upon this our security, and in viewing how you are, alas! "tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine" that we can feelingly and fully understand the Royal songster, when he exclaims, "Blessed are they that dwell in thy house, O Lord, they shall praise thee for ever and ever." And will you not come, my friends, and partake of the joy which I and all Catholics inherit? we feel that we are within the Ark of salvation, and that if we should be lost it will be our own act; we have the lamp, but we may neglect the oil; oh! that the vividness of these clear truths would but illuminate your minds, as a flash of lightning at times breaks through the murky darkness, and shows to the benighted traveller, the dangers around, and the deep gulf below, but alas! alas! your Rule, like a wayward and evil star, still leads you astray. It may indeed appear inexplicably strange that none are more ready to condemn your own principle in the important or even common affairs of life; suppose the Members of Parliament enacted a law that in future it would become the bounden and positive duty of all the people in Great Britain, learned and unlearned, peasants and lords, mechanics and maid-servants, men and women, to make themselves thoroughly acquainted with the laws of the land in every form and shape, how such became to be constituted, in whose reigns the different acts had been passed—those now in force and those rescinded, and would have to compare the copies to the original statutes written in Latin or Old English, and that afterwards they were not to be called upon in cases of law, dispute, or crime to yield their own judgment or opinion to the decision of any Court in the realm, either to Parliament, Privy Council, or to the twelve Judges of England, if opposed to their own version of it, and that without this, they could not be counted good citizens or loyal subjects; would you not turn out such members as carried and supported such a Bill as this, as fools, and send them to Bedlam as madmen? A system that would carry with it all the germs of anarchy, confusion and disruption, and which would eventually overthrow the state and all social order; yet, what is the difference between this would-be wild scheme and your Rule of Faith? I see none, only that the latter is far more difficult to attain and fulfil than the other, leaving individual inspiration out of the question. The system is indeed altogether so monstrously absurd and impracticable, that I would not have the face thus to elucidate it, unless I could adduce numbers of your own divines in support of these my deductions. A famous Non-conformist divine, named Jeremiah Jones, and who wrote about the early part of last century, in a work entitled, "A new and full method of settling the Canonical authority of the New Testament," that, "First, that the right settling of the canonical authority of the books of the New Testament is attended with very many and great difficulties. Second, that it is a matter of the greatest consequence and importance. Third, that a great number of Christians are destitute of any good arguments for their belief of the canonical authority of these books, and that nothing at all had been done by the Church of England, or the foreign reformed Churches to prove that these were the Scriptures." Thus the investigation which takes him three closely printed volumes, as "a matter of the greatest consequence and importance," your rule would have every maid and man-servant in the land, to enter upon the same course. Your celebrated Richard Baxter says upon this point, "are the more exercised understanding sort of Christians able, by sound arguments, to make good the verity of Scripture; nay, are the meaner sort of ministers able to do this? let them that have tried, judge." I shall upon this give you the opinion of another of your great divines, Dr. Beveridge, of the Church of England; the quotation is long, but the subject is vital; he observes in his "Private Thoughts."—"The reason of this my inquiry, is, not that I am in the least dissatisfied with that religion I have already embraced, but because it is natural for all men to have an overbearing opinion and esteem for that particular religion they are born and bred up in; that therefore, I may not seem biassed by the prejudices of education, I am resolved to prove and examine them all, and hold fast to that which is best, for though I do not in the least question, but that on enquiry, I shall find the true Christian religion to be the only true religion in the world, yet I cannot say it, unless I find it upon good grounds to be so indeed; for to profess myself a Christian, and believe that Christians only are right because my forefathers were so, is no more than the heathen and Mahometans have to say for themselves; to be a Christian only upon the grounds of birth and education, is all one, as if I was a Turk, or a heathen, for if I had been born amongst them, I should have the same reason for their religion, as now I have for my own." This may be considered under different views First, that it represents the spirit of your rule, that it is your bounden duty to examine the Bible and judge for yourselves, otherwise that your religious belief is founded upon no better ground than what the heathen or Mahometan builds his upon; this is consistent to your system, though it unmercifully cuts off the ignorant millions, for it is impossible they can put it in practice, "prove and examine them all."—Second, it may be presumed that this Bishop would not calculate all Protestant sects, as professing in all points, "the true Christian religion," and which he thus in the true latitudinarian phraseology of Protestantism implies as being members of the "true religion,"—he would not, I may venture to say, class the doctrine of the "Real Presence, the rejection of Baptism, and Infant Baptism, &c. as part of the true Christian Religion;" no doubt he came to the conclusion that his own particular creed, Church of Englandism, was "the best to hold fast by." This may show to you here what Protestantism really is; you have only to put his sentiments, and they are truly Protestant,—into the mouths of Lutherans, Calvinists, Baptists, Quakers, Plymouth brethren, Anabaptists, and so forth, and mark how it will stand. It cannot reasonably be questioned, but that they as prayerfully and sincerely sought to know, "that particular religion, which is best," as the Doctor himself, still upon "inquiry," they found no reason, no more than he did, to be "in the least dissatisfied with that religion they had already embraced," and to which, of course, each would say they were directed by the Holy Spirit; he could not condemn them for keeping to "that particular religion they were born and bred up in," without condemning himself, for, as he aptly repeats elsewhere, "The premises are the same, though the conclusions be never so different; 'tis still upon the same grounds, that I profess religion, though it be another religion," this he said, relative to heathenism, and Mahometanism, but it is equally applicable to Quakerism, or any other ism. The monstrous inference therefore must follow, that if you allow your principle to be sound, you must grant that all religious sects are right, however much they may vary from the truth, whatever blasphemous or wicked doctrines they may teach, so long as upon inquiry they follow the deductions of their reason and private judgment, they are forsooth to be considered as justified!!

Yours faithfully,

C. A. C.

MRS. CHISHOLM.

We are glad to learn that this benevolent lady is preparing a list of the unemployed operatives, and from the extensive knowledge she possesses of the circumstances of the working people, the situation of the interior, and the resources of the colony, we hope that much good will result from her labours. The subject cannot be too often or too prominently brought before the public mind. —Sydney, Morning Chronicle.

THE GOLD CRUCIFIX PRESENTED TO THE LIBERATOR IN RICHMOND BRIDEWELL.

We have been prevented by matters of pressing interest from noticing a splendid testimonial of respect, gratitude, and love, which the Christian Doctrine Confraternities of Dublin, headed by the Very Rev. Dr. Spratt, presented to the Liberator of Ireland, with a soul-stirring address, on the very morning of the day on which his liberation was announced, to the joy of millions.

This exquisitely beautiful emblem of a Saviour's love is a solid rustic cross, made of the finest Wicklow gold, and of course is, in every sense, of Irish manufacture. The entire stands ten inches in height. The figure representing our Divine Redeemer nailed to the ignominious gibbet, after being condemned by his unjust judges, is five inches long, the figure being admirably proportioned. The whole is as simple as it is chaste, and the material as pure as the purpose is holy. The material is national, the design perfect, and the workmanship exquisite. Such a memorial to such a man, at such a time, and from such a body, cannot be without its significance to the people of Ireland. This precious relic weighs, we understand, fifteen ounces, and the gold is, exclusive of the cost of workmanship, worth nearly 50*l.* —Freeman's Journal.

SOLEMN MASS OF THANKSGIVING AND TE DEUM IN THE CHURCH OF THE CONCEPTION.

The popular joy and triumph on the occasion of the liberation of Mr. O'Connell and his fellow-martyrs were sanctified on Sunday by the most solemn and holy rites of religion, accompanied by all the pomp and splendour which belong to the ancient ceremonial of the Catholic Church. Never, under the lofty roof of the Metropolitan Church, was an occasion of so much interest celebrated; and never, within the majestic colonnades of that noble temple, was a scene more imposing and magnificent displayed. The sacred proceedings consisted of a Solemn Pontifical High Mass of thanksgiving, at which his Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Murray presided; a sermon preached by the Rev. Dr. Miley, and a solemn Te Deum chaunted at the conclusion of the Holy Sacrifice.

For a long time previous to the commencement of the High Mass almost all the seats in the church were occupied by elegantly dressed persons; and before the arrival of that period the sacred edifice became filled with one of the most crowded congregations that was ever assembled within its walls—a vast multitude of people at the same time filling the space in front of the church and some of the neighbouring streets. A few mounted police were in attendance to keep the carriage way clear opposite the principal portico; and notwithstanding the density of the throng, the best possible order was preserved; and the equipages which arrived in rapid succession at the foot of the grand gradatory received no obstruction whatever from the crowd.

At the foot of the pillars on the left hand, or Gospel side of the altar, a throne was erected beneath a lofty crimson canopy, for the Archbishop; and on the opposite side of the sanctuary, near the pulpit, three splendid priedieux, covered with crimson, placed for the Liberator, John O'Connell, Esq., and the Lord Mayor, together with many seats for the accommodation of the other Repeal martyrs and their friends. The aldermen and town councillors, who attended in considerable numbers, were accommodated with places behind the altar and in other parts of the church.

At a few minutes before eleven the carriages of the Liberator and his family, who were greeted with hearty cheers in passing through the streets, drove up to the principal front of the church, when a loud and enthusiastic shout burst from the vast multitude around. O'Connell and his friends, however, entered the church with the least possible delay.

The civic state coach, with the officers of the corporation bearing the sword and mace, and followed by the Lord Mayor, in his lordship's private carriage, next arrived, but his lordship and the officers entered the church without the paraphernalia of office.

Immediately on the entrance of Mr. O'Connell the organ pealed forth its richest tones, and the choir chaunted the solemn anthem, "Eux letemus et letemur in eo, alleluia!" composed for the occasion by Mr. Maydn Corri.

The sacred procession now entered the holy temple, headed by a long line of acolytes with flaming torches and censers emitting clouds of perfume. The Rev. Mr. Laphan, as high priest, attended by the Rev. Mr. Cooper as deacon, and the Rev. Mr. Meagher as sub-deacon, ascended to the high altar; and the venerable Archbishop, attended by the Very Rev. Archdeacon Hamilton as chaplain, took his seat on the throne. The Rev. Mr. Collier, of Rathmines, acted as master of the ceremonies; and among the clergy and church dignitaries who were present on either side of the altar, chiefly in surplices, we noticed the Right Rev. Dr. Gilles, bishop of the eastern district of Scotland, with the Abbé Bonnafous and Canon Curé of St. Pierre in Paris, as his lordship's chaplains; the Rev. Dr. Benahan, Vice-President of Maynooth College; the Rev. Dr. O'Connell, P.P., of SS. Michael and John's; the Rev. Mr. Doyle, P.P. of St. Michael's; the Rev. Mr. Aylmer, S. I., of Gardiner-street; the Rev. Messrs. Meehan, Keogh and Smith, of SS. Michael and John's; the Rev. Mr. Barry, and several other Rev. gentlemen, whose names we did not ascertain, to the number of about thirty.

The chair on the Liberator's right hand was occupied by the Lord Mayor; that on his left by Mr. John O'Connell; and of the other national martyrs, Dr. Gray, and T. M. Ray, Esq., were present. Morgan O'Connell, Esq., D O'Connell, Esq., jun., Mr. Fitzsimon and lady, and a great many other members of the Liberator's family, were in the immediate vicinity of his chair; and the number of Protestant gentlemen present was very considerable.

The Solemn Pontifical Mass was then commenced, the Archbishop officiating on his throne. After the Gospel, the Rev. Dr. Miley ascended the pulpit, and delivered a powerful and eloquent discourse, after which the usual indulgence was announced by the reverend preacher, and the pontifical benediction was given from the throne. After the Ite Missa est, the pontifical benediction was again given, and the Archbishop then left the throne, and, surrounded by his clergy, ascended to the altar and intoned the Te Deum, which was chaunted with fine effect by the choir, supported by the fullest tones of the organ, the Archbishop and clergy remaining at the altar during the time. This portion of the solemn ceremonies was invested with striking and peculiar interest; and the effect of the general scene at the moment, with all the elevated and soul-stirring emotions which it must have inspired, was such as can never be forgotten.

The music of the mass consisted of the following selection, viz:—the Kyrie and Gloria from Haydn's splendid mass, No. 6; the Credo from Haydn's No. 3, and the Sanctus and Agnus Dei from the 15th mass of the same composer. The solo parts were sung by Mrs. Haydn Corri, Signora Corri, and Signor Salabert. Messrs. Morrisson, Glover, and Coleman, with numerous assistants, completed the choir, which was most effective; and Mr. Haydn Corri presided with great skill at the organ. After the Credo the Laudate Pueros Domini was magnificently sung by Mrs. H. Corri; and throughout the whole of the sacred music the choir put forth their powers with admirable effect.

After the conclusion of the Te Deum the Archbishop, with the retinue of priests and acolytes, and Mr. O'Connell, with his friends, retired by the sacristy door; and in a few minutes afterwards assembled in the parlour of the parochial house, where cake and wine were provided; and finally, after a brief delay, the Liberator returned to his carriage, and drove home, in the midst of the exhilarating shouts of innumerable multitudes, who then tranquilly dispersed.—Freeman's Journal.

DR. MILEY'S SERMON.

The Rev. Dr. Miley having received the Archbishop's benediction, ascended the pulpit and read the Gospel for the Sunday (the 15th after Pentecost) from St. Luke, chap. vii., v. 11, 16—

"And it came to pass after this that Jesus went into a city called Nain, and there went with him his disciples and a great multitude. And when he came nigh to the gate of the city behold a dead man was carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow; and much people of the city was with her. And when the Lord saw her he had compassion on her, and said to her, weep not. And he came near and touched the bier, and they that carried it stood still. And he said: young man, I say to thee, arise. And he that was dead sat up, and began to speak. And he delivered him to his mother. And there came a fear on them all, and they glorified God, saying, that a great prophet has risen up among us; and God hath visited his people."

Pointing impressively to the inspired page from which he had been reading, the preacher then said:—

"This is a portion of the Gospel that stands in but little need of commentary. A display, at once the most affecting and decisive, as well of the infinite benignity as of the Omnipotence of the Redeemer, it speaks not only to the intellect but to the heart, in such language as never fell to the lot of man, or even of angels. But even were it otherwise, and that this beautiful and touching narrative stood in need of the exposition which it is customary with us to give of the gospel every Sunday, it nevertheless occurs to me that it would not be looked upon as censurable or in the least degree surprising if, deviating from the usual course, I should entirely consecrate my discourse on this occasion to celebrate the privileges, the celestial benignity and the praise of the Virgin Mother of our Lord; because this day, beloved brethren, (the 8th of September,) is the feast of her ever glorious and memorable Nativity.

"Would it be meet to permit such a festival to pass by in silence? How would that accord with the intentions of the church? how would it accord with the paternal solicitude of our venerated Archbishop to see a devotion, at once enlightened and full of ardour, fostered among his people towards our Blessed Lady? or how would it harmonize with their filial piety towards her, to whom, from tenderest childhood, they have delighted to resort for advocacy and consolation, as to their 'life, their sweetness, and their hope?' In fine—would it not be unpardonable, and indeed preposterous, not to mention her name, and even dwell with rapture upon the praises of this ever gracious Queen of Heaven, to whom, under God, we are indebted for the signal, the astonishing, I will not hesitate to call it the miraculous, interposition from on high in favour of our country, on account of which we are congregated round those sacred altars to tender Him our solemn thanks through the adorable sacrifice of the Eucharist, together with anthems of triumph and jubilation? "Te Deum laudamus, Te Dominum confitemur?"

"Nay, independently of all this to set forth the genuine views of the church concerning the Blessed Virgin, to vindicate and enforce them by argument is a matter of that importance that it can be hardly ever considered out of place, or be too frequently repeated. Not only is it requisite for the encouragement of devotion among the Faithful, it is indispensable to preserve them from the shipwreck of their faith. For while Catholics are, on the one hand, instructed by their church to regard with the profoundest veneration the Virgin Mother of their Redeemer, and are invited to implore her advocacy, and to rely upon it with the greatest confidence, they are exposed, on the other hand, to be assailed for these very practices with charges of idolatry, and with detracting from the merits and the prerogatives of the only true Mediator, Christ Jesus; in short, by reason of our tenets on this head, we are perpetually and bitterly reproached with setting aside the august and saving mysteries of the atonement, to introduce in its stead a gross and impious superstition.

"This is a grievous and an every-day impeachment. But is it true, beloved brethren, or capable of being sustained by proofs? Or rather, on the contrary, is it not self-evident from the Gospel that the theory and practice of our religion, with regard to the Blessed Virgin, so far from being inconsistent with, or subversive of, the atonement, is in fact an inevitable consecratory of that doctrine; and of all other means the most effectual for keeping it vividly before the minds not only of the more educated classes, but even of persons the most illiterate, and of the tenderest age.

"For in what, let me ask, does the doctrine of the atonement consist but this:—that by uniting hypostatically divine with the human nature in the Second Person of the Most blessed Trinity, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ became entitled and qualified to stand as Mediator between delinquent humanity, on the one hand, and an offended Deity on the other? Because while, by virtue of his human nature, he was enabled to present himself invested with our crimes and responsibilities (as was Jacob in the garments of Esau,) that the stripes due to our iniquities might be laid upon His shoulders 'who knew not sin, but was made sin for us,' and that in His bruises we might be healed; whatever he thus endured, as our brother and great representative before the bar of eternal justice, became entitled to a degree of merit and value infinite, as being truly and in the most rigorous sense attributable, not to either of the distinct natures separately, but to his person (the second of the Blessed Trinity,) in which, as I have said, the two natures were united hypostatically, that is to say, after a mysterious fashion analogous to that by which a spiritual and a material nature, a soul and a body, are united in man. Through the divine nature alone the atonement could not have been effected, because to be perfect, to be condign, the satisfaction should be tendered and carried into effect by one who was really a member of the attained race—by one who, participating in human nature, though unstained by its criminality, could still literally and in truth be regarded as our brother; and need I insist on the manifest impossibility of any finite being, as a mere mortal must necessarily have been, no matter how pure and perfect, being ever able to make competent reparation to the Infinite Creator, whose outraged honour and dominion could not be repaired unless by one standing on a par with Him in Godhead. Hence we find it laid down in that formulary of faith which is admitted by all who deserve the name of Christians; we find it to be stated in the Nicene Creed to be the Catholic and only saving faith, that Christ our Redeemer is God, from the substance of the Father, of whom he was generated before all ages, and man from the substance of his Mother, the Immaculate Virgin Mary of whom in time he derived his birth. Grounded upon the inspired assertion of the Evangelist, 'that the word was made flesh'—upon the common creed handed down from the Apostles, and in the infallible authority of her own Tradition; the true Church of Christ ever insisted upon this doctrine, and struggled through many centuries in spite of every persecution in the world, aided by the spirit of darkness, could bring against her to maintain it in its integrity. The Arians would have admitted that Christ was like to God (Homoiousios;) they would have admitted that he was in a certain sense equal to God; some of them even offered, in order to gain their point, to give him the title of God, without qualification of any kind, and even to adore him. In short, like some who in our own times will state almost everything that is Catholic regarding the blessed Eucharist, teaching that Christ's real body and blood "are verily and indeed given and received in the Sacrament," who will even worship Christ under those symbols, and coincide in everything but in the term Transubstantiation. So it was with those ancient heretics. They were ready to admit—to believe everything with regard to Christ's divinity except the adopting, the term of consubstantial (Homoiousios) which the church devised, under the guidance of the holy spirit, to define the nature of his divinity with precision. It is true they upbraided her with keeping the world in agitation for the sake of an iota, but despising this impious and unmeaning sarcasm, she spurned every attempt at compromise, resisted every stratagem and threat of tyranny, condemning every doctrine but that which admitted and believed that Christ was not of a similar but of the same identical substance with his Eternal Father. Nor was she less peremptory in maintaining that he was, by virtue of his humanity, of the same substance with his Vir gin Mother. Even so early as the times of the Apostles, and throughout the entire East, in Judea, in the vast countries of Asia, in Greece, and Egypt, there appeared immense swarms of opponents to the doctrine, usually known under the title of the Gnostic Sects. These were distinguished into four great tribes, or families, broken up into innumerable subdivisions, having the most grotesque titles, disagreeing with each other, and subject, as must ever be the case with those who reject the principle of authority, to incessant internal variations. But whether sprung of the carnal prejudices of the Jews, as was the case with the Ebionites, or of the dreams of Zoroaster of the intellectual arrogance of Greece, or of the foul mysteries of the Nile, they all, and amidst all their discrepancies and variations, were of wonderful accord in rejecting the privileges assigned by the church to the Blessed Virgin. The Jewish Gnostics, for instance, denied that there ever had been in Christ any participation whatever of the Divinity until his Baptism at the Jordan, and that he was forsaken by the spirit which had then descended upon him before he was led forth to suffer upon the cross. While those of Hellas, of Egypt, and the East, were for rejecting altogether the reality of his human nature, maintaining that he was invested in the mere phantasm of a body, and only appeared to suffer through a deception of the senses. It was against those blasphemies that St. John directed the entire of his Gospel, and especially the opening of it, where he says that the word eternal and consubstantial with the Father was 'made flesh and dwelt amongst us.' St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Jude, and St. James denounce them; and when all those impieties were again revived by Eutiches, and embodied in his formal assertion, that the Blessed Virgin could not be called the Mother of God, the Faithful Spouse of Christ, amidst the plaudits and congratulations of the Christian world, levelled against them the lightning of her condemnation. And, as at the council of Nicea, it was defined that Christ was consubstantial with the Father, through his divinity; it was defined at Ephesus that, through his humanity, he was consubstantial with his Virgin Mother. Wherefore it is, that by the genuine doctrine of the atonement we are bound to believe that the body in which Christ, seated at the right hand of God, is adored by the whole prostrate hierarchy of Heaven, that the body which was broken for us on the cross, and the blood which issued in a redeeming tide from His most sacred heart, were in their totality derived from the substance of the Virgin Mother's womb. That this is the only true and saving faith regarding the atonement, it is impossible to question; and with such convictions, let me ask, if it be not obviously unreasonable and preposterous, not to say right down impiety, to regard a being privileged by the Deity, as we see this Blessed Virgin to have been; to regard her who has been brought, not into proximate, but into intrinsic communion with the Deity, with any other sentiments or views but those with which she is regarded by Catholics.

tered for him in his childhood—for him whose hand when opened 'fills every animal with benediction'—had she been merely appointed to watch over his tender years, to cradle his infancy upon her bosom, and maintain him with the lifetide from her breast, how could it have been possible for us, oh, good and gracious Saviour, ever to have exaggerated the dignity, or to have outstripped the bounds of veneration that would be due to one who had stood in such august and endearing relationship to thee? Even the sepulchre where they reposed his lifeless body for a little while became glorious from the first. In ages of faith to liberate it from insult, all Europe precipitated itself on Asia. Even in this age of scepticism and tepidity, where is the Christian who could behold or even think of it without feeling a glow of sacred enthusiasm within his breast. The cross on which he suffered death—the pillar at which they scourged him—the crown of thorns—the lance that pierced his side—the nails that fastened his venerated members to the wood—are they not, and have they not ever been, in every age and by every people on whom Christianity has shed its rays, regarded as relics most hallowed, and deserving of every veneration, merely on account of their near contact with the frame of our Redeemer? And oh! ye powers, brilliant and tremendous, who stand as His chivalry around the throne of Heaven's Emperor, is it to be conceived that our miserable intellects can ever exaggerate or even attain to anything bordering upon an adequate appreciation of her greatness who has given from the substance of her own womb that glorified humanity which is adored by your angelic legions, along with all the orders of the just made perfect? Why, instead of being at a loss for arguments to sustain the privileges of this Virgin Mother, those which force themselves upon us in contemplating the Mystery of the Incarnation are so overpowering, that we almost shudder, even under the urgency of our sacred office, to repeat them. By virtue of those relations that exist between babe and mother did not Jesus actually live for nine months with the life of Mary? Did not the hearts of Jesus and Mary throb during that term with but one pulsation? Was it not the self-same tide that circled through their veins? Who, then, shall be able to estimate the madness, the infatuation, not to say the blasphemy, of upbraiding us with paying exorbitant honour to the Virgin in placing her image or her picture on the altar of her son—in carrying her represented in processions of his eucharistic presence, when we see her brought so near him, identified so perfectly with him, through this divine mystery that we may say of them both, during this period, that, in a certain sense, they were but one; or who is it that hopes for his salvation, through the blood that was shed on Calvary, can bear the thought of any disrespect being offered or even conceived towards her from whom that tide of redemption was originally derived. But these perhaps are deductions not warranted by the Gospel. Do they not spring inevitably, as I asserted, from the very nature of that mystery on which the great doctrine of atonement depends? or in what other light, let me ask, was this point considered by personages in the Gospel under the immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost? Why, the Catholic Church in her most fervent extacies has never saluted the Blessed Virgin in language more utterly at variance with Evangelical or Protestant views in general than that made use of according to the Gospel of St. Luke by Saint Elizabeth, then bearing in her womb St. John the Baptist; 'And it came to pass,' says the Evangelist, 'that when Elizabeth heard the salutation of Mary the infant bounded in the womb, and Elizabeth was filled with the Holy Ghost; and she cried with a loud voice and said, blessed are thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb, and whence is this to me that the Mother of my Lord should visit me.' This St. Elizabeth was of the royal line of David; she was allied to the hierarchy of Aaron. She had become the mother of him to whom Isaiah had pointed as to the 'angel' that was to go before and announce the Long Expected. Yet, with all these majestic titles and privileges of grace and favour before God, and while under the influence of immediate inspiration, she is, as it were, overpowered with reverential feeling and homage in the presence of the Blessed Virgin. 'And whence is this to me,' she exclaims, 'that the Mother of my Lord should come to me?' Mark, also, that the entire honour seems to be here assigned to the maternity of the Blessed Virgin. Nor would this language of the Gospel have escaped without being censured as irreverent and derogating from the respect due solely to the Redeemer, had it been used by the Church without authority from Scripture, or by any Roman Catholic writing on this subject. In the first verse, likewise, which I have quoted, the coming of the Holy Ghost upon St. Elizabeth is made to appear the consequence of her having been merely saluted by the Blessed Virgin.—To the same cause is attributed the inspired exultation that seizes on the infant Precursor. 'For behold,' says St. Elizabeth, 'as soon as the voice of thy salutation sounded on my ears, the infant in my womb leaped for joy.'—While the soul of Mary is far from being elated by eulogies and respect—so far transcending everything that could be assigned to Prophet or to Archangel, she is far from rebuking them as inappropriate, but she says, 'behold, from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed, because he that is Almighty has done great things—that is, effected the greatest of mysteries through me, and holy is His name.' And if any one, still contending against this evidence of inspired writ, which ought to be irresistible, will cavil as if that it had been possible for God to effect all these mysteries, not only through the most lowly but worthless instrumentality, I will not be so inflated as to dispute with him. I will not go about to determine what the Omnipotent could do, but I shall insist, according to the Gospel that is before me, upon what He did. Now, when this Blessed Virgin, upon hearing the announcement of the Archangel, became filled with perturbation and solicitude, the ambassador of heaven said—'Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found grace with God. Behold!—as he had said;—therefore, or in consequence of this singular grace and favour in which you stand before the Almighty—'behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and shall bring forth a Son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus.' So that what appears the boldest assertion of the schoolmen of fathers of the church concerning the Blessed Virgin is here literally declared by the angel, viz., that through her singular perfection in every grace, and her immaculate purity from every, even the most venial trespass, Mary had conceived the Redeemer in her heart before he became incarnate, and assumed human nature in her womb. From those broad principles, not elicited from the erudition of the fathers, or from any ingenious subtleties of the schools, but I may say rather quoted than derived by any argument, from the obvious, literal prima facie signification of the sacred text, it follows as an inevitable consequence that the efficacy of the Virgin Mother's intercession must transcend that of any saint or angel, or of all of them united, before the mercy seat. But if any one will be still so rash as to resist this evidence, I have again only to take refuge in the Gospel, for there, in the 38th verse of the chapter from St. Luke so often quoted, I find it, I may say in express terms, that every grace and blessing derived to us through the Incarnation and death of our Redeemer was left in a manner depending, and, as it were, risked by the Divine ordination on the will and deliberation of the Blessed Virgin. For it is obvious that was the case during the interval intervening between the first announcement of the mystery to her by the Angel, and the instant in which she said, 'Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it done unto me according to thy word.' In reality and in fact the decree whereby God gave us all things in giving us his only son for our redemption is here sanctioned by this mysterious being, and is not, as it were, effective and complete until ratified by her assent—'Fiat mihi secundum verbum tuum.' With this before his eyes, who shall be so stupid or so unjust as to impeach us for believing that His graces and mercy are bestowed by her Divine Son upon those for whom she supplicates, when we see it so arranged by increased wisdom that the concession to us of that Redeemer himself was made dependent on the concurrence of her will; which not less now in Heaven than from the first moment of her existence upon earth, has never ceased to harmonize at any instant with the will, ever blessed, of our Father who is in Heaven.

"But, in enforcing the efficacy of the Blessed Virgin's prayers, would it be pardonable to pass by unheeded the evidence in favour of it which is, I may say, forced upon us by the very triumph itself, for which we are assembled to give thanks and praise to the Almighty within this His glorious temple? Men, I know, will say to me that it is puerile and superstitious to look in this event for the hand of heaven, much less for the intercession of the Virgin Mary; but did not the Pharisees say something very similar when the man who was born blind stood before them restored to sight? "Give glory to God (they cried;) we know that this man is a sinner (the blasphemous hypocrites alluded to our Redeemer!) He (that is, the blind man) said then to them, if he be a sinner I know not; one thing I know, that whereas I was blind now I see.' And may not we, in like manner, appeal against these cavillers to the evidence of the fact? Is not he that man whom his opponents triumphed over but the other day, as if they held him irretrievably in his dungeon, as manifestly, and may I not almost say as miraculously restored to liberty as was the blind man restored to sight? Is he not now surrounded with the light and fragrance of the sanctuary at the foot of that altar he set free, who had no prospect a few days ago before him but to pine out the dreary winter as a captive, in a prison's gloom? To dispute that he is there before us, with his fellow-martyrs, not only liberated, but triumphant, and exalted on a pedestal of renown, more colossal and imperishable than any on which he ever stood before, would be scarcely broader absurdity than to maintain that it was a thing to be expected that he should be so, or that it can be attributed to anything short of an interposition from on high. As for my own part, I have conversed with hundreds upon the subject, many of them veterans, hardened by the keenest realities of every-day life, and amongst them all I have not encountered one who did not attribute it to the hand of God. One, a gentleman interested as agent for the defence, not more than an hour after he brought us the tidings, addressed me to the following effect:—'Sir,' he said, 'you see that inscription there before us. I have read those words—I had them printed in London—'THE SENTENCE IS REVERSED—O'CONNELL IS FREE.' I heard the Lord Chancellor of England declare it from his place in parliament—I witnessed and shared in the rapturous congratulations of O'Connell's friends and the confusion of his enemies. With my companions, bearers of these tidings, I have travelled two hundred miles over land, and crossed the sea; I am cognizant of the outpourings of joy, gratulation, and tenderness, that I see concentrating around the Liberator here, close beside us, and yet so unlooked for, so contrary to everything we dared to hope for or anticipate, is this event, that I am almost tempted to doubt of its reality and disbelieve my senses.' And why, in short, should it be surprising that such should have been his sentiments, considering our experience of what had happened since those proceedings commenced, which have been already registered on the page of history as a mockery, a delusion, and a snare? Were not all the first principles of law set at naught, and the most solemn guarantees of the constitution trampled upon? It was to no purpose that advocates the most gifted pleaded in his favour, and that he himself demonstrated his own innocence of a foul conspiracy, and the injustice that was done to him. Appeal after appeal, though now admitted to be just, was slighted. The verdict was secured—his enemies were as if beside themselves for having, as they vainly imagined, wrested from him the wand of his infallibility in the law. He was consigned as a convict to a prison cell. It is true the constitution still left him one, but it was manifestly a forlorn hope, for who could have expected that antecedents so marked by injustice would have eventuated in impartiality? And, in fact, up to the very last moment, was not everything so opposed to the slightest hope of an equitable issue, that nothing of the kind could have been anticipated by the most sharp-sighted statesman? Was it not a cause so desperate as that even a gambler durst not risk a wager on the issue? Yet to apply the expressions of the blind man in the Gospel, if it be a miracle I know not. One thing I know—that whereas but the other day he was a captive in a bridewell, he is here to-day, rejoicing in that liberty with which Christ, at the prayer of His Virgin Mother, has made him free. Not a convicted conspirator, but a hero, a patriot, and a benefactor to his country—to the whole human race—who, as by his power, he is on a par with monarchs, is lifted even above emperors by the moral sublimity with which his exertions and his wrongs in the cause of his country and of humanity have invested him.

"Again and again I take up the expression of the Gospel. If it be a miracle, I know not. One thing I know, that what I have stated already, and am about to state, are facts. It was at a juncture when no cloud of adversity even threatened him that he first placed himself and his great cause under the protection of the Blessed Virgin. It was on the 15th of August, in the year of redemption, 1843, that he performed this solemn act. On that day he stood on Tara of the Kings, surrounded by myriads of devoted men, and not less brightly smiled upon by prosperity than by the sun of Heaven that poured its meridian splendours upon his head. I find from the report of what he said that it was in that hour he made the following declaration:—'This is a holy festival in the Catholic Church; it is the anniversary of the blessed day when the Mother of our Redeemer ascended from earth to meet her Son, and reign with him for ever. Oh! I hope I am under her protection—I hope that our sacred cause has her prayers for its success (loud cheers.)' The church within the last year offered prayers throughout the Christian world for the cause of religion in Spain, and against the sacrilegious plunderers of the church in that country; and what happened? The minion of these plunderers has fallen from power, and nobody can tell how! He made no effort to return, and nobody can tell why? It seems as if he had been bewildered in his course from on high, and the tyrant of Spain has fallen from his power and his palmy state. Was this a mere outburst of enthusiasm inspired by the solemnity of the day and the scene around him, or did this devotion, so fervid in the hour of success, give way, or even wax doubtful, under the chilling influence of adversity? So far from it, that it was exactly in proportion as all human hope of deliverance seemed to expire, that he and his devoted friends applied themselves with redoubled fervour to propitiate the intercession of the Blessed Virgin. They joined from day to day in devotions, with this special object assisting at the holy sacrifice—participating in the divine communion—distributing alms—and applying, as far as was within their power, to the spiritual and corporal works of mercy. He himself, this man so renowned in the world, and exalted by the station to which his virtues have raised him, refused to have those devotions—of the Novena especially—performed in his private chapel, but from a spirit of humiliation, in the hope of benefitting the hapless inmates of the prison whom we are tempted to despise and forget as the outcasts of society, he insisted upon going to the prison chapel, and having them to join in those prayers. He anticipated, no doubt, that their supplications might prove, perhaps of all others, the most efficacious with Him 'who came to save that which was lost'—who left the ninety-nine to seek that one who had strayed in the wilderness. He hoped that he who had received the prodigal with such mercy, and condemned the arrogance of the Pharisee while he received the prayer of him whom that Pharisee so despised, might hear some one amongst them. This proceeding could hardly fail to attract the favour of that being, who is ever ready to receive the sacrifice of an humble and contrite heart. It must elevate him more than ever in the esteem of every enlightened Christian. In fine, the prayers of all were fervently united; still the horizon darkened, but nevertheless there was amongst them all a kind of mysterious presentiment as to the result of the Novena; and that I may hasten to a conclusion, it was not until the first vespers of the festival which we are now celebrating, and in honour of which those devotions had been undertaken, that the official order for the liberation of the captives arrived. The Liberator, the instant he had received it, withdrew from his unjust imprisonment to his own honest home; but still did not fail to return next morning to join in the concluding solemnities of the Novena; and it was after having done so that he ascended the car of triumph. As I have before asserted, I am not making of ordinary events a miracle, but I am reasoning upon recorded facts. It will not be questioned that since the prison gates of St. Peter were thrown open at the prayers of the church, down to the fall of Espartero alluded to by O'Connell but the other day, the history of religion abounds in the most signal incidents of a similar description; but perhaps it is that this is a cause that could not be smiled upon by Heaven, as if his ultimate aim were not identical with what is pointed out as most meritorious even in Christianity—to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to provide homes and refuge for the outcast; in short, has he not perpetually declared that his object is to remove those impediments which human blindness and injustice have thrown in the way of the free and benign operation of that Providence which has so munificently blessed his native land. Would that venerable Pontiff, who for the independence of religion, would as joyfully ascend the scaffold as he would the altar of sacrifice, have ever sanctioned the triumph of yesterday by those solemnities we celebrated, had he ever thought that this man had been a guilty conspirator, or that he aimed at anarchy or insubordination? And as to the means by which he has laboured for success, do they not consist in the rejection of brutal violence, and of whatever that can lead to outrage? Again and again he has proclaimed himself the apostle of moral as opposed to physical force. He has denounced all illicit combinations, and proclaimed again and again, as the event has proved it, that the whole mystery of his success consists in violating no law, committing no crime; and all amongst his followers who would slight those principles he has repeatedly denounced as giving strength to the enemy. All this was admitted even by the judge who passed sentence. If, then, the cause be sacred as the means are accordant with Christianity, how can it be said that the reverse of which we speak was one that could not have been brought about by Heaven, or that she who is entitled the Mother of Mercies, and the Comfortress of the Afflicted, would have disdained to regard with an eye of pity a nation of mourners, who have been signalized before all Christendom and during a long and disastrous lapse of centuries for their unconquerable fidelity to the faith of her Divine Son—No, no, well may one exclaim 'Hæc mutatio, est dextræ excelsi.' It is impossible not to recognise in it the finger of God. If God then be for us, what matter who is against us. Seeing, as it were, thus visibly that the protectorate of this cause so solemnly offered to the Queen of Heaven has been accepted, what perils, what sacrifices, what duration or extent of adversity shall be able to extinguish the hopes of our country—or turn aside our people from the onward path of order, obedience to the laws, strict observance of morality and of Christian patriotism, persevering to the end? Through gratitude for the blessings so immense and so unexpected, for which we are assembled here to praise him before these sacred altars, who or what shall be ever able to separate us from the 'love of Christ and of his 'faith once delivered to the saints.' Shall tribulation, or distress, or famine, or nakedness, or danger, or persecution, or the sword? Or shall it not be with us and with your descendants as it has been with your ancestors in the faith, that in all these things we shall overcome because of him who hath loved us?

"Hail Holy Queen, Mother of Mercy, our life, our sweetness, and our hope, to thee do we cry poor banished sons of Eve; to thee do we send up our sighs mourning and weeping in this valley of tears; turn then, most gracious advocate thine eyes of mercy towards us, and after this our exile ended, show unto us the blessed fruit of thy womb, Jesus. Oh! most clement—most pious—most sweet Virgin Mary, pray for us. Oh, Holy Mother of God, that we may be made worthy of the promises of Christ.—Amen."—Freeman's Journal, Sept. 14, 1844.

• ROMÉ.—The political annual for the Roman States has just been published. It contains the following facts:—On the 18th instant the Pope will have accomplished his 79th year. He has occupied the Holy See since the 2d of February, 1831. The sacred college consists of 60 cardinals, 6 of whom are cardinal-bishops, 44 cardinal-priests, and 10 cardinal-deacons. There are still living 2 cardinals, created by Pius VII., Oppizani and Riario Sforza, and 7 by Leo XII. The 51 remaining were appointed by the present Pope. Monsignor Tardini, the oldest cardinal, is 85 years of age, and the youngest, Monsignor Schwartzberg, 35. At the close of 1843, Rome possessed a population of 170,701 inhabitants, exclusive of the Israelites.—Tablet.

No. 24.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1844.

[VOL. VII.]

THE LORD BISHOP (WILSON) OF CALCUTTA AND THE ROMAN CATHOLICS."

Under this heading, a letter signed, "Anglicanus," (neither a priest nor a papist) appears in the Delhi Gazette of the 30th ultimo, and as the communication is equally interesting to our Protestant and Catholic readers, we make no apology for transferring it entire to our own journal. The letter is no less distinguished by its tenderness for the honor of Protestantism, than by the spirit of candour and justice with which it vindicates the Catholics of Bengal from the aspersions and insinuations of Bishop Wilson; and we are confident, that it speaks the sentiments and convictions of all the liberal and educated Protestants of Calcutta. While we must deplore the uncharitable and indecent spirit of sectarian antagonism which marks the Protestant Bishop's effusions, in season and out of season, it is consoling to observe that the educated portion of his own flock are so far from being in the spirit of Christian charity and the knowledge of facts, as to be able at once, to detect and spurn the religious poison by which he would infect their minds, in sneers and side-wind insinuations.

Thank God, the time when sneers and unfounded insinuations might hold the place of facts and arguments is passed, and we have only to regret, that, contrary to the adage, men are not changed with the times. Above all, it is a matter both of surprise and regret, that a man of Dr. Wilson's learning and station, should remain in our days, a sad memorial of an unhappy era, like some colossal monument of a nation's dishonor, which speaks to posterity of the crimes and folly of another age. What can we expect from the poisoned ignorance and low sectarian hate of the Christian Advocate and its constituents; from the fanaticism of Free Church and no Church outers; from the ephemeral spawn of Protestant bigotry and discord, if neither the liberal education, nor the high station, nor the ministerial character of Dr. Wilson, can save him from the disgraceful sectarian littleness of having recourse to sneers and side-wind insinuations against his Catholic fellow Christians, to the disgust and scandal of his own flock.

Dr. Wilson addresses a number of Protestant gentlemen and ladies, on the occasion of laying the foundation stone of a new Church at Simla, and such is the indecency to which even dignity actuated by bigotry condescends, that the Bishop actually sneered, when he should have prayed or praised, and threw out side-wind insinuations against his fellow Christians, when he should have stimulated his flock to imitate them in the laudable spirit of Christian rivalry.

If our readers distrust what we state, we invite them to read attentively the letter of "Anglicanus" (neither a priest nor a papist,) which they will find entire in a subsequent page of our present issue.

The following extracts from the letter of "Anglicanus," seem to deserve particular attention.

"The Bishop of Calcutta can scarcely be ignorant how much the Catholics, with very limited means, have already done for the cause of education and civilization in several parts of India;—and how much the generality of Catholic Clergymen in this country are respected for their piety and benevolence, and for the interest they take in the well being of their flocks. The testimony of a sincere and candid opponent is ever the most valuable when it tells in one's favor. Dr. Buchanan was no friend of the Roman Catholics, and he condemns what he calls their asperity and intolerance. Yet if the Bishop of Calcutta would condescend to peruse the "Memoirs" of Dr. B. he might learn from him how much the Catholic Clergy were respected by the natives for their learning and medical knowledge, and in general for their pure manners. The Dr. acknowledges (with reluctance apparently) that "the Roman Catholic Church possesses a civilizing influence in Asia"; and has dispelled much of the darkness of Paganism." Honor to those who are engaged in so noble a work, then; and good speed attend them! not—withstanding the attack of the Lord Bishop of Calcutta, who would fain arrest them in their schemes of "cheap education."

"What is the Bishop afraid of from the contact of educated Catholics and Protestants with each other, and a free mutual interchange of their opinions and views on religious subjects? Why should he warn a number of grown up educated gentlemen and ladies at Simla against being seduced into the adoption of Romish notions. This was but a poor compliment to their understanding. It appears a sort of tacit acknowledgment of the weakness of the Protestant cause. That cause, if founded in truth, can never suffer, but must gain by fair and temperate discussion, conducted between educated and well-bred people, Catholics and Protestants, during their friendly intercourse in social life.

"That the Catholics have been instrumental to a great extent in improving the moral condition of the natives of India in many places and dispelling the darkness of paganism I have already shewn by the testimony of a very competent and unexceptionable witness, Dr. Buchanan. In further proof of the same assertion, I may adduce the testimony of another Protestant gentleman, Sir Alexander Johnston, late Chief Justice of Ceylon. In an address which that liberal-minded public officer transmitted to the Archbishop of Goa, he remarks "the propriety of their (the Catholics) conduct reflected great honor upon the priests of the Order of St. Philip Neri, who have the charge of their instruction. In a circuit which I made round the island I was much pleased to find that there was not a single Catholic brought to me for trial."

"There were then about 66 thousand Catholics in the Island—this was in 1807—and in 1826 there were about 160 thousand. Now, Sir, I appeal to you, as a public Journalist, and to your readers, interested as we all are in the diffusion of knowledge in this country, and in the elevation of the standard of moral character among its teeming inhabitants, if it were either prudent or politic, dignified or charitable, in the Right Rev. Prelate—the head of the Church of England in India, to attempt, on the occasion of the solemn ceremony alluded to, to sink the character and disparage the labors of men who, as a body, have already done and are still doing so much for the enlightenment and civilization of the natives of this country as the Roman Catholics."

In our next we shall offer a few observations on the subject of Cheap Education, sneered at by Bishop Wilson.

ORDINATION

AT THE CATHOLIC CATHEDRAL.

It is with unfeigned pleasure and deep gratitude to God for the copious blessings his mercy continues to pour down on his Church in Bengal, that we announce, that in the ensuing Ember week, an ordination of Sub-deacons, Deacons, and Priests will be held at the Cathedral. The Ordination will commence on each of the three appointed days, Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday, at 10 o'clock, The Right Rev.

Bishop Olliffe will officiate on Wednesday and Friday, and the Archbishop on Saturday. During the solemnity of Saturday, the Very Rev. Mr. McCann, S. J. Rector of St. Xavier's College, will preach, and after the Sermon, a collection will be made in aid of the Missions in the country districts of the Bengal Vicariate. A letter just received from one of those Missions announces the admission into the Catholic fold, by Baptism, of twelve persons, partly Mahomedans and partly Hindoos. In Calcutta and its vicinity, the number of young and adult Protestants admitted to conditional Baptism within the short period of the last month, is, we understand eleven. Two Englishmen, Protestants, are now under instruction preparatory to their admission to the Sacrament of Regeneration. We have had so many solid proofs of the zeal of our brethren for the advancement of the true faith, that we deem it quite unnecessary to exhort them to contribute generously according to their means, to the support of our country Missions. No more appropriate occasion than that of the approaching Ordination, could be selected to appeal to them for their co-operation in so holy an enterprise. Two of the candidates for priesthood, Mr. Treacey and Mr. Prendergast, are students of St. John's College, a third, Mr. Cooper, is one of the Professors attached to the College of St. Francis Xavier, Chowringhee.

CONVENT OF ST. FRANCIS XAVIER, BOW BAZAR.

On Sunday, the 8th instant, (Feast of the Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary) we witnessed the interesting ceremony of the opening of the Church of St. Francis Xavier, Bow Bazar. This elegant Chapel, lately fitted up in the most tasteful style for public worship, is attached to the Branch of the Loretto Convent just established in that locality.

The Convent and Chapel promise the choicest blessing which religion and education can bestow, and, we have no doubt, will prove as eminently useful, as they are certainly necessary in that populous and Catholic district. A sight of the religious and educational establishments in Bow Bazar, will amply repay the labor of a journey of some miles under an Indian sun, and we will not, therefore, endeavour to supply inadequately, by description, the gratification which sight of the premises and institutions cannot fail to afford to every friend of religion and education, who may visit them. Too much praise cannot be bestowed upon our venerated Archbishop and the benevolent individuals who co-operated with his Grace in this Establishment; but as the Rev. Mr. Kenny, in his sermon on the occasion of the opening of the new Church of St. Francis Xavier, alludes, in suitable terms of praise, to the merits of all the parties concerned in this good work, we shall not anticipate his very judicious and eloquent observations.

At seven o'clock, the Rev. Mr. Kenny, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Formosa as Deacon, and Mr. Treacy as Sub-Deacon, proceeded to the celebration of High Mass; Messrs. Crone, Byrne and White acting, respectively, as Acolytes and Thurifer. The singing was very good, and the choir, assisted by a sweet-toned organ, conducted by one of the Nuns, well sustained the solemnity of the occasion, creating, by the joyous tones of harmony, in the minds of every one present, a prophetic anticipation of the consoling results which, it is to be hoped, religion will derive from the institutions, that day opened to its hallowed services.

After the Communion, the Rev. Mr. Kenny of St. John's College, proceeded to congratulate a very numerous and respectable congregation, on the felicity of the occasion which they had assembled to celebrate.

"I congratulate you, beloved Brethren, (said the Rev. Gentleman) on the scene which is this day opened to you; a scene of great joy and exultation to every individual assembled here this morning, but more particularly to the families resident in the district of Bow Bazar. A few months since, there was no place of public worship in this District; there were no schools for the education of your children; but, thanks and praise be to the Creator, by whom all things were made, and without whose Divine aid we are able to do nothing, (since of ourselves we are nothing) but with whose aid all things are possible, you behold, on this morning, a neatly fitted out church, schools accommodated to the capacities and conditions of all classes, of the poor as well of the rich. And to whom is the direction of these schools entrusted? Under whose immediate care are they placed? They are to be conducted by the ladies of the Loretto House, ladies as remarkable for their high talents and rare acquirements as for ardent zeal in the cause of religion;—persons who have consecrated themselves to God from their youth, who have forsaken their parents, their friends and their homes; who, at the risk of their lives, have courageously and cheerfully crossed the expansive ocean and stemmed the raging billows of a boisterous sea, to break the bread of Christ to his little ones, and to minister, with parental solicitude, to their various spiritual wants; to teach them the respect which they owe to their parents, and to impress on their tender minds the principles of our holy religion. And by what motive have they been influenced to do all this? Solely for the honor and glory of God, with the hope of being one day admitted into the choirs of virgins, whose prerogative it is to follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. But to whom principally, under God, are we indebted for the many valuable institutions situated in the different parts of this city? In pronouncing the name I pronounce the eulogy; our zealous and most illustrious Archbishop. Of himself, however, he could not have accomplished so great and glorious an object, but the pious and generous Catholics of Calcutta, under his Grace's guidance and auspices, have accomplished, in co-operation with him, so great and so good a work;—a work so noble in itself, so honorable to our holy religion, and so meritorious before God. For the spacious and commodious edifice in which we are now assembled, we are indebted to the pious generosity of Mr. Cooper, who has this day a strong claim on our gratitude and prayers.

"Churches and Convents are dedicated solely to God, though often under the patronage of some Saint, that the faithful may be excited to implore with united suffrages the intercession of such saints, and that Churches may be distinguished by different titles. "We do not," says St. Austin, "erect churches or appoint priesthoods, sacred rites and sacrifices to Martyrs, because, not the martyrs, but the God of the martyrs is our God;" and we this day dedicate this Church and Convent to God, under the patronage of the glorious Apostle of the Indies, that the faithful, by their united suffrages, may implore his intercession to enable them to become now what he was, and, hereafter, what he is."

We are unable to follow the Rev. Gentleman to the end, though we should be glad to do so, for the edification of those who have not heard him. He took occasion to say, that that day, being the feast of the Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary, added a peculiar interest to the solemnity of the dedication of the Church of St. Francis Xavier, and this observation naturally led the zealous preacher to magnify, to the great edification of his hearers, the glories, the privileges, and the dignity of the mother of God, recommending himself and the congregation, towards the conclusion, with affecting earnestness, to her powerful and merciful intercession.

As this is the first occasion we have had the pleasure of hearing the Rev. Mr. Kenny preach, we beg leave, very respectfully, to observe that we were as much edified by his earnestness of manner and affecting piety, as enlightened and gratified by that energetic and perspicuous style which is peculiarly his own, and we are led to hope that the Revd. Gentleman's ministry will be fruitful in many blessings.

In the evening Vespers were sung and Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament was given by the Rev. Mr. Kenny. The course both in the morning and evening that assisted at Divine Service was very great.

THE SIRDHANAH COLLEGE.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—The expected arrival of our worthy Bishop, Dr. Borghi, from Europe, via Bombay, accompanied by six Professors, for the Sirdhanah College, seems a fitting time to call public attention to the Institution, and I, therefore, send you an outline plan and elevation of the new front, now in course of completion, for insertion in the Herald, should you deem it likely to conduce to the desired object.

The building, a large substantial Native house, was purchased by the Bishop last year, on the eve of his departure for Europe, and the alterations were intrusted to the Rector, who has shewn no little ingenuity in converting its many nooks and corners, into airy comfortable apartments. When completed, the edifice will consist of nearly thirty rooms, the three principal or centre ones, which will serve for the scholars, measuring respectively eighty-eight, fifty-four, and thirty feet in length, and the rest being of habitable sizes suited to the residence of the masters.

The area between the front wings, shown in plan, is a raised terrace, ascended by a flight of stone steps running along the entire front of the building. Below is a court enclosed by a railing, beyond which is a spacious compound extending to the public road, where the Estate is bounded by a neat wall, with a handsome entrance.

The endowment of the College provides only for ecclesiastical students, but the Bishop has it in contemplation to establish also a pension school in connexion with it, and it cannot be doubted that such an Institution, effectively conducted, will prove a great blessing to such portions of society as cannot afford to send their children for education to the Himalayan hills.

By the beginning of the year His Lordship expects to have rejoined his Diocese, when no time will be lost in making arrangements for the opening of the College, and publishing a Prospectus of the Course of Education, and terms of admission.

Yours faithfully,

W. H. GRAHAM,

Co-Trustee.

THE REV. MR. ZUBIBURN, AND THE NOAKALLY MISSION.

It will give great pleasure to our readers to learn, from the following letter, that the pious efforts of Rev. Mr. Zubiburn to establish the Mission of Noakally, have been blessed with great success. So truly Apostolic a Priest as Mr. Zubiburn undoubtedly has shown himself to be, is well deserving of encouragement and support from every one who has at heart the conversion of the Natives of this country.

To HIS GRACE, THE MOST REVD. DR. CAREW,
Archbishop of Edessa, and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

MY LORD,—I respectfully beg leave to bring to the notice of your Grace, the truly deplorable state of the Christians of the District of Noakally, comprising a number of about six hundred people, but who are perfectly ignorant of the Doctrines of their Faith, never having had the benefit of a clergyman to live amongst them; consequently they had no opportunity of receiving any instructions.

Whilst ignorance possessed so mighty a sway over these poor people, your Grace will not be surprised to learn, that, on my arrival at the station, about six months ago, I found no decent habitation for the performance of the Sacred Ceremony;—the one used for the place of worship, besides being made of hay, was in so delapidated and ruinous a condition, that I deemed it prudent to knock it down, in order to place the ground in good order.

Satisfied and convinced in my mind that in the work of God, He would bless my efforts, I commenced soliciting the aid of the community and of several pious Catholics of Chittagong, and finally came down to Backergunge and took advantage of the inhabitants of that place, who very liberally came forward to contribute according to their means for the erection of the House of God. I respectfully beg leave to annex herein the names of the Subscribers, and the amount

I further beg permission to remark to your Grace, that the inhabitants of Chittagong and Backergunge who have assisted the good cause, have, in their own stations, several institutions to support, yet they did not hesitate to contribute a mite to my proposal. In having gone over and traversed from one country to another to solicit contribution, I have at last been convinced, that the amount already obtained, will be too little for the erection of a "Pucka" Church, a Parochial House, and a School, for all which purposes, I have secured a suitable piece of ground.

Aware as I am, of the liberality of the Catholics of Calcutta, and of the frequent instances of their support to charitable Institutions, I was so long diffident to obtrude on their liberality, but apprehending that my remaining silent may injure the prospect I have in view, I, therefore, beg respectfully to submit the same to your Grace, with the humble prayer, that you will use your powerful aid and influence in the good cause, and with the earnest solicitude for a place in your daily Prayers,

I remain, my Lord, your Faithful Missionary,

THOMAS ZUBIBURN.

COLONEL LAW DE CLAPPERTON,
Knight Commander of the Legion of Honor,
Governor of Chandernagore.

His Excellency Colonel Law having lately arrived here from France, in order to take charge of the French settlement at Chandernagore, came to Calcutta in the course of the present week, for the purpose of paying his respects to the Governor General of India. During his stay, he honored the Archbishop and Bishop Ollivé with a kind visit, and expressed a desire to see the Institutions under their Lordships' care. On Wednesday his Excellency, accordingly, visited St. John's College and the Orphanage of St. Joseph in its immediate vicinity, and on Thursday morning, after having devoutly assisted at Mass in St. Thomas' Church, he inspected the Schools and spacious apartments of the Loretto Institution. On taking leave of the Lady Superior and religious Ladies, His Excellency in the most handsome manner, expressed the high gratification which his visit to that noble Institution had afforded him, and begged that the pupils might be indulged with a play day, a favor which was cheerfully granted and joyously accepted by the young ladies. From Loretto House, Colonel Law proceeded to the Convent Schools of St. Francis Xavier, Bow Bazar, and next to the Cathedral, and the several Schools in connection with it. With the order and cleanliness of all the establishments he seemed greatly delighted, and at the same time much surprised to learn, that all that he witnessed was accomplished by the voluntary subscriptions of the Catholics of Bengal, unaided by any Government assistance. On the part of our Brethren, we beg to express our respectful gratitude to His Excellency for the kind interest he has been pleased to evince for the welfare of Catholicity in Bengal. It is cheering to reflect that in acting thus, Colonel Law exhibits not only his own kind and religious disposition, but also that of the Royal Family of France, a family, that, in after ages, will, we trust, be rendered more illustrious by the recollections of its great services to the Catholic Faith, than by the splendor of its station or its conquests.

CHINSURAH.

The Sacrament of Confirmation was administered on that Sunday in the Catholic Church of Chinsurah by the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe, to about twenty-five Recruits, who are about to march for the Upper Provinces.

LINES COMPOSED ON THE OCCASION OF THE LATE PROFESSION OF NUNS IN CALCUTTA.

Come, Sisters, come, with heart and voice,
And gladdened souls with pride rejoice,
That pomp and show have pass'd away,
And that, from this auspicious day,
Our thoughts and hopes to God are given,
For, Sisters, we are brides of Heaven!
Oh! never more shall worldly pride,
Or worldly dreams within us bide,
Our aim, our end, for God alone;
Oh! may he make us all his own!

And here, dear Sisters, here at last,
Our perils and our dangers past,
The goal to which our hopes were turn'd,
The lot for which our bosoms burn'd,
Gained and won. Oh! favour'd thus,
Should there be mortals blest as us?
Then let us wing our lowly lay,
For blessings on this glorious day;
For blessings upon him who bore
Us all in safety to this shore:
Oh! rare it were indeed to find
A guide so gentle and so kind.

And, as the knee we humbly bend,
In incense let our prayer ascend,
For him, beneath whose fostering care,
Religion proudly prospers here:
Who has no wish, no hope, no thought,
That is not for its welfare fraught.
Then let us bless the high command,
That placed him o'er our chosen land,
And pray that every hour be rife
With all he covets most in life.

Oh! what a blessing to console
The suffering heart and wounded soul,
To still the accents of despair,
And lead the sinful one to prayer;
To calm the spirit's burning pain,
And bring it back to God again!

To tend the sick—their woes assuage,
By readings from the Holy page,
To minister alike to all
In cottage poor, or lordly hall.

With equal care on each attend,
At once their solace, and their friend,
Dispensing worldly, vain renown,
And looking only to that crown,
Which God has promised to bestow
On those, who do his will below.
In that bright region where no shade
Can ever cause its bloom to fade!
Such, Sisters, be our glorious task,
And now His blessing let us ask.

Oh! God, Omnipotence divine!
All suppliant at thy holy shrine,
With humble heart, and bended knee,
Oh! hear the prayer we waft to Thee.
As from our souls it purely springs,
Before thy throne, Oh! King of kings!
Do Thou, oh Lord, thy grace impart,
And with its balm exalt each heart,
And strengthen by thy holy grace
Thy handmaids in the path they trace;
In which they hope, they trust to be
The harbingers of joy to Thee.
Bless, oh! bless our holy choice,
And bid us, by thy grace, rejoice.

Oh! Virgin, in the hour of pain,
Never called upon in vain,
Mother holy, Mother dear,
Bear aloft our humble prayer,
And beg of the Almighty power,
Bright blessings on our path to shower!
And may the Saint, whose festive day
We celebrate with pious lay,
With the Almighty intercede,
And help us in our hour of need;
And grant us by the grace of God,
To tread the path that he has trod!

Thus, Sisters, thus, with heart and voice,
We join for blessings on our choice

THE LORD BISHOP OF CALCUTTA AND THE ROMAN CATHOLICS.

To the Editor of the Delhi Gazette.

Sir,—Knowing the impartial and liberal spirit in which you are accustomed to treat everything affecting the interests or feelings of any class of the community, I venture to send you a few remarks suggested by a passage in the address of the Lord Bishop of Calcutta on the occasion of laying the foundation stone of the new Church at Simla, some weeks ago. The Bishop is a public character, and what he utters on public occasions in his official capacity, is a fair subject of animadversion in the public journals, especially when he uses language designed and calculated to lower the character and credit of any man or class of men in society.

The Right Rev. Prelate in the address alluded to, among many appropriate and excellent exhortations, warned his hearers, “to avoid hasty and rash judgments” in regard to the conduct and motives of their neighbours. He then straightway himself indulges in some exceedingly offensive, if not “rash and hasty,” insinuations against his Roman Catholic fellow Christians. He talks in a sneering tone of their “cheap education” and “tricking advertisements,” and cautions his hearers to beware of them.

To my apprehension, Sir, such language as this is unworthy the Right Rev. Prelate's exalted station. It is inconsistent with his character as a minister of the gospel of charity and peace —and it must have been distasteful to not a few of the educated and liberal minded gentlemen who were present on the occasion. No one can blame his Lordship for defending his Church and her doctrines, and exposing the fallacy of the Romish creed, on all suitable occasions, either by speaking or writing, in public or in private. It is his duty to do so. But to attempt, as he did on this occasion, by a sort of side-wind to injure the reputation and lower the credit of men who are engaged in strenuous endeavours to diffuse the benefits of knowledge and civilization in this land of heathen darkness, can only redound to his own discredit. What may be the schemes of “cheap education” set on foot by the Catholics of Bengal or the “tricking advertisements” put forth by them, and which appear to have excited the pious indignation of his Lordship I do not know. I confess I feel some curiosity on the point, and some of your other readers may do so also. Can you inform us? With the respective merits of the Protestant and Catholic systems of faith I do not mean to meddle.

That is a subject unsuited to the columns of a newspaper.

But when an individual of the Bishop of Calcutta's justly respected character, acknowledged talent, and prominent station, uses his influence to excite odium against a class of men publicly engaged in schemes of benevolence and Christian charity, the public have a right to know something more against them than mere vague insinuations—which is all the Bishop has condescended to give as the ground of his calumnious attack against them on the occasion of the late solemn ceremony, which took place at Simla.

The Bishop of Calcutta can scarcely be ignorant how much the Catholics, with very limited means, have already done for the cause of education and civilization in several parts of India—and how much the generality of Catholic Clergymen in this country are respected for their piety and benevolence, and for the interest they take in the well-being of their flocks. The testimony of a sincere and candid opponent is ever the most valuable when it tells in one's favor. Dr. Buchanan was no friend of the Roman Catholics, and condemns what he calls their asperity and intolerance. Yet if the Bishop of Calcutta would condescend to peruse the “Memoirs” of Dr. B. he might learn from him how much the Catholic Clergy were respected by the natives for their learning and medical knowledge, and in general for their pure manners. The Dr. acknowledges (with reluctance apparently) that “the Roman Catholic Church possesses a civilizing influence in Asia; and has dispelled much of the darkness of Paganism.” Honor to those who are engaged in so noble a work, then, and good speed attend them!! notwithstanding the attack of the Lord Bishop of Calcutta, who would fain arrest them in their schemes of “cheap education.”

We cannot expect that even the Metropolitan Protestant Bishop of India should be exempt from the common infirmities of man's nature. And some degree of envy at the success of the Catholic schemes of “cheap education,” prosecuted with so much ardour, may have mingled with his feelings of indignation at the pretended or insinuated misconduct of those who gave out the "tricking advertisements." The Bishop can never have desired to deceive the public even to advance the interests of his own Church. His character places him far above that suspicion. Yet the remarks he was pleased to make in reference to the Catholics are calculated to deceive the public. Those whose reading is limited, and who take all their notions of the Catholics and their schemes of education from the writings or conversation of illiberal or bigoted Protestants, will fall into the snare which the Bishop spread for them. But it is the boast and glory of the British Press, wherever planted, that it will never suffer any man or party of men, however obscure or uninfluential, to have their principle misrepresented or their characters injured by even the most powerful or the greatest. The press of India especially plumes itself on its freedom from party and sectarian prejudices. In consistency, then, you will join me, I am sure, in attempting to discourage the introduction or spread of sectarian and religious animosity in this country, which the Bishop's language on the occasion alluded to is so well fitted to kindle and fan into a blaze.

He would have the public believe that the Catholics are meditating designs the most pernicious to society, and injurious to the cause of Christianity. He would circumscribe the limits of their labors, and if they presume to go beyond those limits, he launches forth his anathemas against them as evil doers and deceivers of men. Great men find ready imitators, and the tocsin of religious warfare having been sounded by the Bishop of Calcutta, lesser champions may be expected to rush into the field, armed for the fight. What is the Bishop afraid of from the contact of educated Catholics and Protestants with each other, and a free mutual interchange of their opinions and views on religious subjects? Why should he warn a number of grown up educated gentlemen and ladies at Simla against being seduced into adoption of Romish notions. This was but a poor compliment to their understanding. It appears a sort of tacit acknowledgement of the weakness of the Protestant cause. That cause, if founded in truth, can never suffer, but must gain by fair and temperate discussion, conducted between educated and well-bred people. Catholics and Protestants, during their friendly intercourse in social life. The right of private judgment in religion is the main pillar upon which the Church of England rests. Yet the Bishop would deprive his flock of that right, and denounce as evil doers those who would presume to seduce us into the exercise of it—a thing which Roman Catholics, by their "cheap schemes of education" and "tricking advertisements," it seems attempt to do. With the propagation of peculiar religious tenets a public newspaper has nothing to do. But it has a great deal to do in the encouragement of schemes which exert a beneficial effect upon the moral state of society, and tend to diffuse useful knowledge. That the Catholics have been instrumental to a great extent in improving the moral condition of the natives of India in many places and dispelling the darkness of paganism I have already shown by the testimony of a very competent and unexceptionable witness, Dr. Buchanan. In further proof of the same assertion I may adduce the testimony of another Protestant gentleman, Sir Alexander Johnson, late Chief Justice of Ceylon. In an address which that liberal-minded public officer transmitted to the Archbishop of Goa, he remarks "the propriety of their (the Catholics) conduct reflected great honor upon the priests of the Order of St. Philip Neri, who have the charge of their instruction. In a circuit which I made round the island I was much pleased to find that there was not a single Catholic brought to me for trial."

There were then about 66 thousand Catholics in the Island—this was in 1807—and in 1826 there were about 160 thousand. Now, Sir, I appeal to you, as a public Journalist, and to your readers, interested as we all are in the diffusion of knowledge in this country, and in the elevation of the standard of moral character among its teeming inhabitants, if it were either prudent or politic, dignified or charitable, in the Right Rev. Prelate—the head of the Church of England in India—to attempt, on the occasion of the solemn ceremony alluded to, to sink the character and disparage the labors of men who, as a body, have already done and are still doing so much for the enlightenment and civilization of the natives of this country as the Roman Catholics.

This letter is rather long and rather rambling, but if you think it will contribute to dispel prejudice—unfounded prejudice—against our Catholic friends from the mind of the public, and to neutralise the injurious effects of the Bishop's remarks against them, you will perhaps insert it when you have plenty of room and to spare.

I trust it contains neither a rash, hasty, nor uncharitable or disrespectful expression towards the Right Revd. Prelate. I should be as unwilling to use as you would be, I am sure, to publish, any such expression. I, in common with all to whom his character and conduct is known, entertain too high a respect for him to do so. His disinterested zeal in the cause of religion, his zeal and activity in every good work are, in my opinion, beyond all praise. The prejudices of cast, and of education, and effects of early associations are, in my opinion, chiefly to blame for that effusion against the Roman Catholics, which he lately gave vent to at Simla. Yet it was every way so unsuited to his dignity and character that it is to be hoped on reflexion he will regret it and never repeat a similar one.

Yours,

ANGLICANUS.

P. S.—The illiberal and intolerant spirit which the British Catholics have, since the days of Elizabeth, suffered so cruelly in their rights, liberties, property and reputation, has now in a great measure, been banished from British ground, by the good sense and humanity of the Government and people. This evil spirit, however, appears, to have taken refuge and found a hearty welcome on the shores of India, and particularly by what is called the "religious press" at Calcutta. No act of misrepresentation is considered too disingenuous and illiberal, provided only it tell against the Catholics. As one glaring instance of this, some individuals of that persuasion in Calcutta had, it appears, got printed an absurd and impious letter said to have been written by our Lord, and which all Catholics of any pretensions to education know to be a spurious invention. This letter got into the hands of two distinguished members of the "Religious Press of Calcutta," the Editors of the Free Church Man and Christian Advocate, who published it in such a way, as to entrap the public into the conviction that a belief in this impious production formed part and parcel of the authorised creed of the Roman Catholic Church!!! In this discreditable attempt to mislead the public, they were backed by the Englishman newspaper. Some of the Englishman's correspondents had even the affrontery and downright imbecility to reason as if every extravagant and trashy book issued from a Catholic Book-seller's Shop, must form part of the authorised creed of the Roman Church. Can any thing go beyond this?

N. B.—The fact (supported by Government Official Returns) that in the course of little more than 20 years the Catholic Christians, in the Island of Ceylon, had increased from 60,000 to about 160,000, with the strong testimony which I have adduced to the propriety of their moral character, might very profitably have been brought to the notice of the Protestant Missionaries in India, by his Lordship the Bishop of Calcutta as a stimulus to them. Even yet he may do so on the next occasion of any public ceremony at which he presides. The field of mission labor is wide in India, and there is plenty of scope for both Catholics and Protestants. Let them strive with a generous emulation to rival each other in the noble work of dispelling heathen darkness, and diffusing the benefits of knowledge and civilisation, laying aside all malice and uncharitableness and evil speaking. I am neither a priest nor a papist myself, but I do like to see fair play to all parties, and hate all sort of detraction and evil speaking.

ANGLICANUS.

We have also, under the head of "correspondence," inserted a communication which, at first sight, will be said to reflect harshly upon the revered head of our church in this country, but we think that every one who reads it through will say we have but acted impartially in giving room to it; we have done so, however, with great reluctance, as we do not like to make our columns, albeit very moral ones, the arena for anything involving religious discussion, and it will strike many who saw the Lord Bishop's address in our paper that the paragraph which is complained of did not appear on that occasion, and the reason why it did not is, that, being left to our own discretion, we omitted it; the Friend of India, however, published it, and it has, as we supposed would be the case, given offence, not only to Catholics, but to Protestants, as ANGLICANUS, we have every reason to believe from other letters in our possession, is a Protestant. He has, however, divested his letter of anything approaching to a discussion of religious tenets or practices, and confines himself to the consideration of what he considers a slur cast upon the efforts of the Catholics to impart education to the heathen, and we are bound to confess that the paragraph in question does bear that imputation, however far it may have been from the intention of the Lord Bishop to have cast it. We heartily agree with ANGLICANUS that, so far as Catholics are concerned, we should rather assist their efforts in educating the natives than attempt to ridicule them, and we should indeed feel sorry if it were thought that our views were so sectarian as not to admit the good that has been done by Catholics as well as Protestants in this country, and it is a good proof that no very invidious spirit does exist, when all classes come forward to assist the poor Catholics of Gwalior upon the broad principle of their being Christians, though of a different sect. We are no friends to the fulminations occasionally lanced against our erring brethren, but should like to see the doctrine of "Love thy neighbour as thyself" acted up to as much as it is preached.—Delhi Gazette, Nov. 30.

O'CONNELL IN THE CONCILIATION HALL.

On Monday the Liberator appeared in the Conciliation Hall for the first time since his release from unjust captivity. His fellow-martyrs it was known intended to appear there also. The circumstances of the day were, therefore, calculated to collect an assemblage such as should do honour to the occasion, to the leader, and his compatriots. It surpassed even the expectations of the most sanguine. The hour named for taking the chair was one o'clock, p. m., but before nine o'clock in the morning Burgh-quay was crowded, and soon after the Conciliation Hall became filled from floor to ceiling. Indeed at eleven o'clock it became absolutely indispensable to close the outer doors, for the anxiety to be present prompted the people without to consult their own gratification more than the convenience of those who had possession of the hall, and the pressure threatened to become extremely discommoding.

At the hour just named a number of ladies of high respectability, accompanied by their male relatives, filled the flagway from Hawkins'-street to the door of the committee-room. An announcement, in large characters, the most annoying which could possibly be offered, here met their view:—"The galleries are crowded; no more ladies can, therefore, be admitted." What was to be done? It was too bad to go back, after having pressed forward with some difficulty, and the way of retrogression was by no means easy. It was in vain that those who could not enter offered to turn round; they who were behind were as eager to press forward, hoping they might be more fortunate, and a "crush" succeeded, to which the lobby of the theatre on an opera night affords some apt but faint resemblance. Ladies are not easily turned from their object, and they entreated and pressed, complained and solicited. It was not easy to refuse. But what was to be done? There was no more room inside, the admission of others, therefore, would only incommode those already there, as well as those who should be allowed to enter. The door keepers were inexorable, and the ladies were excluded. Hundreds were obliged to return home ruminating on the more earnest zeal of their fair sisters, who had secured their places in the early morning hours.

Inside the hall there was not as much space unoccupied as one would plant a staff upon. And yet there was neither disorder nor confusion. The spirit of mutual accommodation pervaded all the assembly. Each man yielded to what his neighbour required, and the harmony thus secured was greater than we have ever witnessed in so large and crowded an assembly held within the walls of any building. There could not have been less than FIVE THOUSAND human beings in that hall.

As the hour of meeting approached, the anxiety of the people became more intense, and every eye was directed to the entrance by which the Liberator and the martyrs were expected to make their appearance.

Presently a cheer was heard throughout the building. No man had entered, and many wondered what it meant. The surprise was instantly dispelled—Mrs. John O'Connell, Mrs. Fitzsimon, Mrs. French and other ladies of the Liberator's family had just taken the seats reserved for them, and had the blood brought brightly to their brows by the recognition of which they were the objects. At the same time with those ladies Mrs. Gray, accompanied by some female friends, entered the gallery, and amongst the ladies present were Lady J. Serle, sister to the Earl of Shrewsbury, who accompanied Mrs. James O'Hea; the lady of Sir Valentine Blake, Bart., M.P., was also present. Mrs. Bay was also in the box.

Another cheer was heard—a vigorous hearty cheer. This time the object of recognition was a gentleman, however—it was the Repeal martyr, Richard Barrett. The feeling which was subsiding again rose louder and louder, hearty and heartier—it was Dr. Gray who entered. The cheering revived anew, and eyes were again directed towards the entrance, when a welcome rung around, and the strong and earnest face of Thomas Steele rose above the gentlemen on the committee benches.

Scarcely had this cheer subsided, when another equally prolonged and enthusiastic announced the approach of another of the seven—it was Mr. Ray, the talented and justly popular Secretary of the National Association, whose reappearance amongst the friends of Ireland, to resume his important functions, was hailed with delight by his admiring countrymen.

Presently Mr. Daniel O'Connell, jun., entered and was loudly cheered. Next Mr. Nicholas Maher, M.P.; then Mr. Robert Browne, M.P., loudly applauded, his friend and colleague, Mr. M. Blake, M.P., and Sir Valentine Blake, Bart., M.P., followed, and each had his meed of well deserved applause, and Henry, the patriot son of the patriot Grattan, the M.P. for Meath, received the welcome which became his manliness. The scion of an ancient line then entered—yesterday he made his debut at the Corn-Exchange. He was, therefore, of course unknown, but his plain-spoken good sense proves that he is not likely to continue so; the gentleman is Mr. P. Somerset

Butler, M. P. for the country of Kilkenny. About this time also entered the Right Worshipful Edward Smithwick, Mayor of Kilkenny, who had come to present an address from the citizens of Kilkenny, congratulating O'Connell and the martyrs upon their liberation, and to invite their representative, Mr. John O'Connell, his illustrious father, and the co-martyrs of both, to a banquet in that city. Captain Mockler, a gentleman who was an Orangeman, and who had been coerced by English injustice to become a Repealer, was also among the prominent personages present. He had already declared his opinions, but he had not joined the association before that day, when he had come up with an address from the people of his vicinage to O'Connell. The Rev. Mr. Tierney, who had escaped a martyrdom for which no man was more prepared, was present on this glorious occasion, and near him we observed the Rev. Dr. Murtagh, of whose hospitality the Liberator and his friends partook, as he was en route to Mullaghmast.

During the entrance of these gentlemen a continued succession of cheers rung through the Hall, and now a perfect roar, like the rough commingling of many waters, rose from floor to roof, and the proud, erect, and dignified, and still fine and vigorous from of burst upon the view of as generous, devoted, and enthusiastic an assemblage as ever hailed a chief. What a noble study was that man, who had just stepped from a prison to the tribune whence he wielded a power more supreme and illimitable than any monarch of the world. For his power has its deep foundation in the people's hearts, and his will is based upon the coincidence of their interests with his.—How elate his air! how joyous his demeanour! how elastic his step! how bounding and exuberant his spirits!—How beautifully, rapidly, yet clearly, did his countenance reflect his emotions, and his body obey the high intelligence which swayed it.

Peal upon peal arose the acclamation—roar rose on roar as billow follows billow—the poor and the wealthy—the rough and the gentle—the feeble and the vigorous—the young and the old—joined, as with one voice, in the outpouring of their exultation at the triumph—the constitutional triumph which Ireland had achieved over the injustice of her foes. No language could do justice to that scene—no imagination exaggerate it. Gradually he who was its object reared his tall form to its full height; his breast swelled—his eye dilated—his aspect assumed a look of mingled severity, pride, and conscious power, which communicated to his form the grandeur of a hero and the enthusiasm of a prophet.

At the same time with the Liberator, the Lord Mayor and John O'Connell, M.P., entered the hall, and their names were frequently mingled with the applause.

While the cheers were yet reverberating from basement to roof-tree, Mr. Smith O'Brien entered, and offered to the Liberator his manly and hearty congratulations; as the former, with almost parental feeling, received the cordial greeting of the younger leader, it seemed as if the embodied spirit of their Celtic fathers had revived and was continued in the persons of those noble men who bear all the characteristics of their race. Mr. O'Brien thenceforth led the cheers himself.

The acclamation—but the word is cold—had continued for some minutes, and manifested no symptoms of waning, when O'Connell waved his arm, and almost as quick as the action, what was the roar of the tempest became as the murmur of the distant sea. As soon as silence had been perfectly restored—

The Liberator, who had remained standing since his entrance, and had repeatedly and with his characteristic gracefulness acknowledged the overwhelming enthusiasm of his reception, now said—Fellow-countrymen, it is my high privilege to move that the Right Hon.

do take the chair (great cheers).

The Lord Mayor having ascended the chair amidst enthusiastic acclamation, said—Gentlemen, it would be affectation on my part were I not to express what I feel at this moment—a moment which I feel to be the proudest of my life, in having conferred upon me the honour of being called to the chair on this very important and most auspicious occasion (cheers). Gentlemen, I will commence by congratulating you all on the liberation from captivity of the man to whom we are all indebted for our religious liberties (cheers), and to whom particularly I feel specially indebted for the high civic position I hold as well as for the honour I enjoy to-day (cheers). I believe it will be admitted that no man living ever contributed so much to the liberty of the human race as O'Connell (cheers). Even it is admitted by his enemies, and it would be ingratitude in his friends were they for a moment to cease to acknowledge it (hear). I think if it could be possible to pay an individual for such a long life of patriotic exertion, so far as grateful manifestations can go, he has been to a great extent compensated. I was never so delighted at any scene as at that of Saturday last. There were at least five hundred thousand of his fellow-countrymen—their hearts overflowing with affection and gratitude, and anxious to take a look at the Liberator as if they had never seen him before (cheers). One great principle established by the recent judgment—one great thing which I have to congratulate you for is that it has struck at the system of jury packing for ever (cheers). That system has got a blow which I trust it will never recover from. Right and law has had a triumph—a signal triumph over tyranny and injustice (cheers). I feel that it would be unpardonable in me to occupy your time unnecessarily long. I feel more than I can express for the honour you have done me to-day. I did not expect to live ever to boast of such a distinction (cheers). As I see some of the leading men of the country around me, and as I know you are anxious to hear him whom you naturally look up to as your leader and benefactor, I shall conclude, merely thanking you again for the honour conferred upon me (great cheers.)

Mr. Ray now presented himself in the secretary's box, and was about to read the minutes of last day's proceedings when he was interrupted by a loud burst of acclamation. He attempted to proceed, but it was impossible—the cheering perfectly drowned his voice. He then closed the book, and still holding it in his hand, said—My Lord Mayor and beloved fellow-countrymen, allow me to express the thrilling delight with which I resume the duties of my honourable office of secretary for Ireland (loud cheers). We have had a glorious triumph of justice over iniquity—a miraculous triumph—after the father of his country and my honourable colleagues being consigned by a species of legalized brute force to the felon's dungeon (great cheering). I recollect having heard that amiable gentleman, the Attorney General (terrific groans)—I heard him sneeringly remark that although Mr. O'Connell boasted he would drive a coach and six through any Act of Parliament constructed to impede his progress, yet that he would not find it so easy a matter to escape the Attorney-General's meshes. I know not what the Attorney-General meant by a "coach and six," but this I know, that the Liberator has driven the triumphal car of Repeal through the monster indictment (immense cheering). I will not stop to designate the circumstances by which our conviction and imprisonment were effected. These will probably be touched on by him upon whose accents you ever dwell with delight (loud cheers); but I will ask what have they gained after recklessly subjecting the country to this lengthened turmoil and vexation? Has there been any shrinking—any compromise (loud cheers)? On the contrary, we come restored to our country's cause with increased energies and additional determination (continued cheering). Often have I heard the Liberator exult in his prison at the admirable conduct of his faithful people, whom no exasperation could turn from the paths of rectitude. His spirit was abroad among them, and they followed his counsels (cheers). Over and over again has he told you that no man who took his advice should ever be committed with the law, and faithfully has he kept his word, for his legal fame stands untouched, notwithstanding the utmost phalanx of lawyercraft his enemies could bring to bear against him (great cheering). It is only necessary for your fellow-countrymen to persevere in following his directions. Let every man double, treble his exertions; our cause is now beyond the possibility of defeat, unless, by that which will not happen—any fatuitous outbreak or violence (loud cheering). For my own humble part I have no language to express, and scarcely faculties to estimate, the glory I feel in having been the fellow-prisoner for Ireland, associated with our beloved Liberator, the greatest man of any age; and I come again to the discharge of my public duties with a determination to work on, if possible, with redoubled vigour until Ireland shall again be a nation (loud cheers).

The Liberator rose and said—I have the honour to move that Pierce Somerset Butler, M.P. for the county Kilkenny, a member of a family not only illustrious for the antiquity of blood and race, but more so for genuine affection for old Ireland (cheers), be admitted a member of this association (continued cheers). Many a patriot was given by that family to the cause of Ireland—and my esteemed friend now comes forward to give his devotion to his country. He is ready to live for Ireland, aye, and if necessary, even to die for her (great cheers).

Mr. S. O'Brien—I have the honour of seconding the motion.

The admission of Mr. Butler was put from the chair and carried unanimously, and with acclamation.

Mr. S. O'Brien—My Lord Mayor and gentlemen, it is not upon my own opinion merely that I venture upon the present occasion to trespass on your impatience—the impatience which naturally leads you to desire once more to listen to the accents of him who for so long a time has been removed from your deliberations (cheers). But I have to announce to you an interesting fact, and it is O'Connell himself who desires that before any further proceeding in this hall that fact shall be announced (cheers). I have to propose the admission of a member of the Protestant aristocracy of the country (cheers), and I do so with not the less pleasure, because many of his connexions have strong Conservative tendencies (hear). The name which I have now to introduce to you is that of a brother of Lord Donoughmore, the Hon. Hely Hutchinson (enthusiastic cheers, in which Mr. O'Connell heartily joined). I need not tell this meeting that the Catholics of Ireland have reason to be indebted to the family of Hutchinson, for their constant and enthusiastic advocacy of the Catholic claims (cheers). But I trust that that family is now about to obtain for itself a far higher distinction than of being the faithful supporters of the interests of the great majority of our fellow-countrymen (cheers). I now claim that family for the whole people of Ireland (cheers); for the Protestants as well as for the Catholics. As a Protestant, I here tender to the individual who now comes forward, on their part, my gratitude for having enlisted in the national cause; and I do believe, as I devoutly hope that this introduction to the hall of a member of one of the highest families of the country, is the commencement of an era the most glorious in our history (cheers). I do believe—I know—that there are many men of the loftiest station in the country animated by patriotic sentiments who have been hitherto prevented from joining in our ranks; but I am mistaken if the example of my friend Mr. Hutchinson be not followed by numbers (great cheering). I think it right, however, to tell you that in the case of Mr. Hutchinson there has been no conversion; that he has been for many years—indeed I might say as long as he has been able to judge—an enemy to the Union. Unfortunately the state of his health obliged him to be on the Continent during a considerable portion of his time, and he was therefore not in a position to take part in the political struggles of his country (hear, hear). But having returned during the present year, and seeing the liberties of the country in danger—seeing an opportunity of recovering those legislative institutions which are the sole guarantee for the continuance of a nation's prosperity, he, at the time of your deepest gloom—at the time when your only prospect was that O'Connell and his fellow-captives would spend the winter in gaol—at that time he intimated to me his desire to be proposed a member of the association (cheers). I have now to read his letter for you:—

“Artane, Sept. 4, 1844.”

“SIR,—Allow me to acknowledge your kindness in consenting to propose my name as a member of the National Association.

“Perhaps it may be right I should state my reasons for adhering to the cause of Repeal. They are shortly these: From the period of the Legislative Union the misgovernment—social as well as political—of Ireland had so greatly increased the grievances under which we previously laboured, as to demand in these latter days the application of immediate and vigorous remedies; and it is notorious to the whole world how often, and in vain, the noble assertor of his country's rights, supported by a few not unworthy to combat by his side (amongst whom you, Sir, stood in the foremost ranks)—how often, and in vain, I say, he implored, in the name of our common country, not indeed for mercy, but for justice. That justice, the refuge of the oppressed, has been refused to Ireland, and with contumely; for not only has the Imperial Parliament not thought fit to place this important portion of the empire in a position of political equality with England and Scotland, but has answered our peaceful remonstrances by covering the country with troops and fortresses, as in a time of war; and (what is infinitely more dangerous to our remaining liberties, as well as degrading to generous minds) an attempt is at this moment in progress to stifle, under the forms of law, the right of free discussion, which is the very essence of liberty.

“Now, Sir, these wrongs have been inflicted on Ireland, not by a native parliament acquainted with the wants of the country and anxious to attend to them, but on the contrary, by a large majority of gentlemen totally unconnected with us by interest or feeling, and, of course, necessarily ignorant of the character and habits of the people for whom they legislate.

“The deduction from all this is obvious. If we desire to be free—if we desire that industry should not go unrequited in our country—that starvation should not reign in the midst of plenty, we must resume the undivided management of our own affairs. At this we shall surely arrive by a persevering, peaceful, and constitutional agitation.

“Such, Sir, are a few of the reasons which have guided me in forming the determination that I beg thus to communicate to you. They are those of an honest man who loves his country, and desires to labour for her benefit.

“I again thank you for your obliging attention to my wishes, and have the honour to be, Sir, your faithful and obedient servant.

“GEORGE HELY HUTCHINSON.

“To W. Smith O'Brien, Esq., M.P.”

Now that (continued Mr. O'Brien), you will allow, is an excellent letter; but I have the satisfaction of telling you that there is something quite as good in the postscript (cheers).

“P.S.—In giving my adhesion to the cause of Repeal, I think it right, in justice to the strong feeling I entertain upon this point, to say that I should not take this step if I did not feel perfectly confident that neither by the leaders of the movement nor by the Irish people will the attempt to regain a parliament for Ireland be ever abandoned until success shall be achieved."

The Liberator rose and said—I have the honour of seconding the motion for the admission of the Hon. Mr. Hutchinson; and I claim a right to do so from my personal knowledge of the noble spirit which has ever animated his family (cheers), and of their most useful and energetic exertions in the cause of Ireland (continued cheers). His grandfather was one of the first who stood up against the enactment of the iniquitous penal laws—laws conceived for the purpose of persecuting Christians for merely following the dictates of conscience (hear); the son of that gentleman—the present Lord Donoughmore—was for many years celebrated for his advocacy of the Catholic cause; he never yielded to the paltry persuasions of those so-called friends who wanted to procure religious liberty by some surrender of principle (cheers). He stood out against the "Veto" to the last, and I am glad to find a member of that family who, with Grattan "watched over the cradle of Irish liberty"—now standing by her grave—calling her to life again—glorious and immortal—the protectress of Ireland (cheers). I second the motion, and I do so with more pleasure than ever I seconded or moved any motion before, and I move also that the letter read by my esteemed friend Mr. O'Brien be inserted on the minutes (loud cheers).

The question of admission was put and carried by acclamation.

H. Grattan, Esq., M. P., then presented himself, and was received with loud cheers. He said—My Lord Mayor and gentlemen, my hon. friend stated, as one of the results, I suppose, of the late prosecutions, the accession to our cause of a member of a great and ancient family—one of the aristocracy of the land. I beg, as another result of her Majesty's Attorney-General's prosecution, or rather persecution, to introduce to your notice another portion, and a very influential portion of the inhabitants of this country—the Orange aristocracy of Ireland (cheers). There is here to-day a gentleman belonging to that society, who has at last seen how wickedly and how long a system of misgovernment had been persevered in (great cheers).

Mr. Grattan—He has actually come up to-day, not with an address to the Queen, as some of her Majesty's ministers have done. He has come up with an address to the people, an address to O'Connell (cheers). Here is an Orangeman of Ireland, who, feeling the wrongs of his country, comes forward to join our cause, and does so bringing with him an address of congratulation to O'Connell (hear, hear). Gentlemen, we have every reason to stand by our country; but now that the aristocracy, and more, the Orangemen, are coming round, it would be a baseness in any man to desert her (cheers). We ought not abate one jot, or stir one inch from the ground we occupy (hear). I have but just returned from France, and I will venture to say that if a French minister were guilty, not of the error, but of the fault of the British minister, he would be forced to make some atonement to the people whom he not only injured but insulted (cheers). Not only did we not get an atonement, but we received an aggravation of the original offence, and I am here as an Irishman, as a Repealer, and as a Protestant, to say that the minister must be made to atone for his conduct (cheers). Ireland is not safe, our homes and our children are not safe, if laws are to be thus not only violated, but that that violation is to be afterwards defended. The minister has had the impudence to say that he vindicated his act—these are the words of Sir Robert Peel—and show that the Irish patriots have had a fair trial (hear, hear). Vindicate his conduct! I say he never will be able to do so (cheers). Instead of vindicating, or endeavouring to do so, I again repeat he must atone to Ireland (continued cheers). I came not here to make a speech; but I call upon every man, in the words of Burke, to be firm—let there be no retreating now. We must stand by our original principles; and I, for my part, would not be disposed to flatter England by thanking her for nothing (hear, and cheers). We see in Irish arms and Irish hearts the secret of our success—in these is to be read our victory and our triumph; and it is to you to uphold the principle of our country, the principle of liberty—to follow the advice which my honourable friend has given you, and which on no occasion was more necessary than now (cheers). If you follow that advice you must succeed (hear, hear). Here is a proof of it in the old friends of Ireland, the Hutchinsons, coming forward—a name rendered immortal when the efforts of our ancestors demanded and obtained liberty for the Catholic. He brings with him untarnished the laurels which he gained, when he added glory to the arms of England—the ardour of a soldier, and the spirit of citizen burn in his bosom—he has been proposed by my friend, Mr. O'Brien, and I have now the pleasure of proposing also an Irishman, an Orangeman, and a soldier (cheers.) These are the triumphs of Sir Robert Peel—these are the victories of the Attorney-General. If you only act right you will bring both on their knees to pray the pardon of a people so long ill-treated, deeply injured, and grossly insulted (cheers.) I beg my Lord Mayor, to propose that Captain John Mockler be admitted a member of this association.

The Liberator—I have the honour of seconding the admission of the Orange captain (cheers.)

The motion was unanimously adopted.

P. S. Butler, Esq., M. P., then came forward. He said he should feel himself deficient in courtesy and respect to the vast and truly important assemblage of his fellow-countrymen, by whom he was surrounded, if he did not come forward briefly and energetically to express his feeling of gratitude for the enthusiastic manner in which his name was proposed to, and received by the meeting (loud cheers.) He regretted exceedingly that he was not prepared with a set speech to address them, because if he had been so prepared he would perhaps in some degree be able to express himself in terms adequate to the great occasion which they were then celebrating (cheers.) He would take that occasion of alluding to a speech—or some observations in a speech of Mr. Smith O'Brien (hear.) That gentleman had presided with much prudence and judgment over the national council during the time that an iniquitous verdict and an iniquitous sentence kept the Liberator away. Mr. O'Brien had stated that it was, perhaps, necessary for gentlemen to account for having delayed so long in becoming members of the association. Therefore he Mr. Butler, was bound to tell them why he had not appeared in their assembly before (here, hear.) He was representative of a great and important constituency, and the result of the matter was, that though not a very young man, he was a young member of Parliament, and in going over to the other side he found he had much to learn. If he did not attend he might be perhaps, open to a charge of disrespect to his constituency. He had determined to acquire a knowledge of the forms of the house—to learn, as it were, the A B C of the business, which he could not do without remaining to the close of the session (hear.) He thought that he had performed his duty in parliament, as it would be seen by the list of those who voted last session (hear, hear.) That was the first day since the session closed he had been in the city of Dublin, and before twelve o'clock he came to attend the Conciliation Hall (cheers.)—He would not trespass any further on the time of the meeting, as he knew they were all anxious to hear their great leader; but he could not sit down without noticing the great exertions of Mr. O'Brien, and expressing a hope that his example would be followed by others in the same position; and he was confident that when all Ireland was combined, the effect for which they were labouring would be ultimately accomplished (hear, hear.) In conclusion, he said he hoped that he and the association would be better acquainted (cheers.)

The Hon. Mr. Hutchinson then came forward, and was warmly applauded. He said that as there was such important business to be transacted, he would take another opportunity of expressing his opinion on the question of Repeal (hear, hear.)

Captain J. Mockler said he felt highly obliged and flattered by being admitted one of that great body of Repealers. He had to say that he was a declared Repealer before Mr. O'Connell; he held the commission of the peace for the county Meath for the last thirty years, and for declaring himself as a Repealer he was superseded the commission. He had with him the correspondence which passed upon the occasion of his dismissal, and on a future day he would read it for the association (hear, hear.) He remembered when Ireland had a parliament; he recollected the procession from the castle, the noble equipages that followed in the train of the Duke and Duchess of Rutland when they came down to open the Irish parliament (hear, hear.) The Repeal of the Union would revive that splendour and prosperity again, and, therefore, it was that he was a Repealer (cheers.)

The Liberator—I am going to hand in some money first, and before I do so, I beg leave to correct a mistake into which my friend who has spoke last has fallen; he says he is an older Repealer than I am. I was opposed to the Union the day the act passed, and unless my worthy friend was up earlier on that morning than I was, I cannot see how he can be correct in what he states (laughter.) I now hand in the following remittances:—7*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* from Belfast, per Mr. Thomas M'Evoy, who acquaints us that Belfast has been divided into twelve districts, with an inspector to superintend each, in order to carry out the weekly subscription system, and that though but four of the twelve wards have as yet contributed, it has furnished undoubted proof that the penny-a-week subscription is the most approved as well as the most certain plan of carrying into a glorious reality the mighty object of their solicitude, a domestic parliament. The present remittance includes the subscriptions of 450 individuals, who were heretofore precluded from joining their fellow-countrymen in the struggle for nationality. I have great pleasure in moving a vote of thanks to the Belfast Repealers.

Mr. S. O'Brien seconded the motion, which passed.

The Liberator said he had next to hand in 25*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* from Waterford, per Alderman Delahunty, Repeal rent for August. William Hassett, Richard Gore, and John Long, Esqrs., to be admitted members. From Callan, Newtown, and Coolagh, county Kilkenny, per Patrick Cody, Esq., R. W. V., 13*l.* 5*s.*, third monthly remittance, which will be continued until our parliament is re-assembled. From Wexford 3*l.*, per John Greene, Esq., the patriotic proprietor of that excellent journal the Wexford Independent. From Clogher, per Rev. A. M'Geough, R.C.C., 4*l.* being 28*l.* since January last.

The Liberator then proceeded to address the assembly—Freeman's Journal Sept. 1844.

(To be continued in our next.)

MISCELLANEA.

AMERICA. PHILADELPHIA.—ST. AUGUSTINE'S CHURCH.—The correspondent of the New York Tribune says that the congregation of this ill-fated church have resolved upon the erection of another splendid edifice upon the ruins of the former beautiful one. They intend, first, to put up a small building on Crown-street, upon the site of the residence of the Rev. Dr. Moriarty, which was also destroyed by the mob, for the purpose of affording the congregation a place of worship, until the main building is completed.

SWEDEN. In pursuance of the criminal prosecution carried on against the painter Nillson, of Stockholm, for having embraced the Catholic faith, the Lutheran Consistory having addressed to the Government a violent denunciation against M. Studach, the apostolic delegate in Sweden, the latter has just replied by a publication which throws a strong light on the Lutheran proselytism, and on the melancholy situation of the Catholics in Sweden—Ami de la Religion.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1844.

[VOL. VII.]

BISHOP WILSON AND CHEAP EDUCATION.

We live in strange times. In England, the people call aloud for the repeal of the Corn Laws and cheap bread, and the Tories proclaim that the clamor is really designed to effect a revolution, which will involve in the Aristocracy, together with their possessions. In Ireland, thanks to Father Matthew, cheap drink has become quite the fashion, and the Orange Tories insist upon it, that the whole proceeding is a scheme ingeniously got up for the demolition of English domination and Protestantism. In India, the Catholic clergy and people, despite of poverty and unaided by Government, are labouring together cordially, to diffuse the blessings of education among the poor of their community on easy and encouraging terms, and Bishop Wilson sounds the tocsin of alarm at Simla, and warns the orthodox to beware of the delusion, for it is all a Popish artifice, contrived for the purpose of disseminating Romanism. All things considered, Popery must needs be an extraordinary system. In the middle ages, if its adversaries deserve credit, its talismanic influence was wholly derived from the cimmerian darkness and ignorance in which it shrouded mankind; whilst, in the nineteenth century, withameleon-like facility, it puts off its former hues, and, instead of presenting a sombre or benighted aspect, it actually assumes all the radiant intellectual splendors of education, and by thus adorning its hideousness, endeavours to allure within its embrace, the innocent, unsuspecting babes of the Reformation. Alas! for these poor children, their danger is truly deplorable; how shall they be rescued from the perils that surround them? Will not Government stretch forth a helping hand to free them from the ruthless destroyer? But how can Government do more to sustain them in their difficulties than it has already performed. It has, on the one hand, surrounded the Established Church at home and abroad, with wealth and dignity and civil influence, sufficient to satisfy the cravings of the most ambitious or avaricious of her children. Educational and charitable funds of immense amount, not only those funds which itself has conferred, but also those which were left in trust to Government, by rich Mahomedans, Hindoos and Catholics, it has so disposed of, that, without a single exception, as far as regards Catholics, all the chief offices in the institutions to which these funds have been assigned, are filled by Protestants. Not satisfied with thus pampering English Protestantism on the spoils of Catholicity and Paganism, Government has also liberally extended its fostering care to the followers of the Scottish Kirk, and, if not directly, at least indirectly but effectually, to almost every sect of Protestants in India, which can boast even of a handful of adherents. All this and infinitely more has Government achieved for Protestantism, whilst, on the other hand, it has sedulously and with obstinate and bigoted perseverance, refused any assistance to promote the education of its Catholic subjects here, and has, moreover, sanctioned the adoption of rules and regulations in schools under its patronage which cannot be complied with by a Catholic pupil, without a violation of the religious principles he professes. With respect to the Catholic clergy, the conduct of Government has been in perfect keeping with the illiberal policy which has been just described. On this head, let it suffice to say, that it doles out, often with reluctance and a bad grace, to the priest, who devotes himself to minister to the religious wants of the Catholic Soldiers, in each station removed from Calcutta, the miserable stipend of fifty rupees per month, a sum not much beyond the rent usually required for the smallest Bungalow in a Cantonment. Now, if all this do not suffice on the part of Government, to crush "Popery" and to exalt Protestantism beyond the reach of danger, any further appeal to Government aid, we repeat it, must prove unavailing. Neither, indeed, ought such an appeal be now necessary. For, if there be question of English Protestantism, it surely ought to be able to repose here in security, when its safety is watched over by a Prelate, who is assisted in guarding its welfare, not only by a numerous body of well paid chaplains dispersed throughout Bengal, but also by several other clergymen who derive a respectable salary from one or other of the societies or funds, which have been established, both at home and abroad, in order to uphold and propagate if possible the doctrines of the Establishment. It is true, that, among several of these Rev. Gentlemen, there is reason to conjecture, that the leaven of Puseyism is fermenting, and that, with respect to some of them, (and they are we are assured individuals of much mental and moral worth) it would require some subtlety, to discern in what their creed differs from that of Catholics. But if division and weakness be thus occasioned in the camp of Israel, has not English Protestantism a tower of strength for its support, in the dissenters and sectarians of every class, who, forgetful of their differences from each other, have combined together for the overthrow of Popery. Ought not this to cheer and console the Protestant Bishop, and free him from all morbid apprehensions of danger from the fascinating allurements of cheap education held out by the Romanists for the seduction of the children of the Reformation? Of what consequence is it, that among those leagued together against Rome, his Lordship may know, that there is one, whose sect proclaims, that Episcopacy is a foolish human invention, an offshoot of Satan and superstition? The gratitude of his Lordship for the service rendered by such a person, when a Rev. Gentleman of his own Church was to be set aside and dishonored most informally and irregularly, will make him overlook as trivial the inconvenience of such advocacy. What though another of the motley group should laugh at infant baptism and describe it as a rag of the Babylonish Lady; still, in the main, his efforts merit approval, for his first and greatest object is to demolish the beast that is seated on the Seven Hills! Neither in so great an enterprise, can we expect that attention will be paid to the several other doctrines which divide the preachers, in religious belief, from each other, though they exist to an extent, that if the preachers were, when assembled together, to declaim against Popery, to proclaim aloud to the congregation openly and candidly their respective opinions on these dogmas, the very warmest of their abettors should acknowledge, that their temple of worship had no parallel except the tower of Babel, nor the diversity of their tenets, any more fitting illustration than the confused variety of tongues, which disturbed and confounded the proud and impious architects of that fated edifice.

In conclusion, we shall briefly remark, that whilst the dissemination of temperance and cheap education are the means employed to advance Catholicity, the good will not only have little to fear, but, on the contrary, great reason to anticipate, that many important blessings will be dispensed to mankind. It is a maxim sanctioned by Divine Truth, that it is only the doers of evil that fear the light, and we all know, that education is a lamp that ever guides to virtue, and not to vice.

CATHOLIC CATHEDRAL.

There will be a solemn Pontifical High Mass at the Cathedral on Christmas eve, at 12 o'clock. A Sermon will be preached on the occasion, by the Rev. Mr. Peniston, S. J. of St. Xavier's College.

CONVENT OF ST. FRANCIS XAVIER, BOW BAZAR.

On Christmas eve, at 12 o'clock, there will be a solemn Mass celebrated and a Sermon delivered at the Chapel of the Convent, Bow Bazar.

CHURCH OF THE SACRED HEART OF JESUS, DURRUMTOLLAH.

On Christmas eve, at 10½, p. m. the divine office will be sung at the above Church, and at midnight a solemn High Mass will be celebrated by the Rev. Vicar of the Church. On Christmas morning at 6½, A. M. Pontifical Mass will be solemnized by the Right Rev. Bishop Olliffe. The holy mystery will be accompanied by sacred music directed by Mr. Castello.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH, CHOWRINGHEE.

On Christmas eve, there will be High Mass at midnight. The service in the morning will be as on ordinary Festivals.

PROPAGATION OF FAITH.

During the past week a Bengalee woman who lay dangerously ill expressed a wish to be baptized. After due instruction, she was admitted to the sacrament of regeneration.

During the same period, two children, at the desire of the mother, who is a Protestant, received conditional baptism. We need hardly add, that the mother is disposed also to enter the Catholic communion.

THE HOWRAH CATHOLIC CHURCH.

It may not be uninteresting to those of the Catholic Community, who were not present of Sunday morning, at the Novena festival, celebrated in the Howrah Church, to be informed that a grand Pontifical Mass was performed by Bishop, O'Hiffe, aided by some Clergymen of his order; and that a very appropriate Sermon was preached by one of that body. The Church was well attended on the occasion.

The Minister of that Church, Father Paul de Gradoli, who is the Founder thereof, has been at great labour and expense in building that fine Edifice: he has laid out nearly his all in effecting his purpose, and has been assisted partly by the public at large. At present he is labouring under great difficulty for means to have a Burying Ground; and he intends, if assisted by the generous public, to establish a Free School, for the education of the poor and friendless children at Howrah.

These surely are intentions very laudable; and in order to carry them out, the Padree well deserves to be assisted.—Correspondent Englishman.

THE VICAR GENERAL.

We announced in our last the gratifying news, of the arrival in Sydney of the Right Rev. Dr. Wilson, Bishop of Hobart Town, in good health and spirits; and we are quite sure our readers will participate in our feelings of gratulation at the coming among us of that learned, zealous and exemplary prelate; but we are equally sure that these feelings are not without their alloy of bitter regret, that the arrival here of Dr. Wilson is the precursor of the departure from among us of our beloved friend, and pastor, and guide, the Very Rev. Vicar General, who is to be consecrated Bishop of Adelaide. It is only when we are about to part from those we love and revere, and admire, that we feel and appreciate their worth; and it is only when we have parted from them that we know all our loss. The will of God, however, and the good of the church call him hence, and though painful may be the separation, it is our duty to acquiesce in the disposition made by our good Archbishop, who consults the well being of every portion of the flock confided to him by the supreme pastor.

We would beg respectfully to urge upon all the admirers of the Vicar General, that they hasten to complete the subscription to the testimonial to be presented to him. It is not to be bestowed as a reward—he sought no earthly reward;—it is not as an honour—he wanted no terrene honours: but it is a solemn duty to evince gratitude for favours beyond all price; and to evince to the world that there are men and women in Australia, who know how to appreciate worth and virtue like his; and that the seed he has sown so abundantly, has not fallen on sterile and ungrateful ground.—Sydney Morning Chronicle.

PUSEYITES, ANGLICANS, &c.

A HINT FROM ST. PAUL'S AT ANTWERP TO ST. PAUL'S IN LONDON.—A letter signed "S.," addressed to the editor of the Times, says:—"I reside in Antwerp. During the last eighteen months the Cathedral of St. Paul has been undergoing repairs, &c. A screen of wood or canvass placed before the scaffolding effectually shuts it from the view of the congregation, and the usual services, four a day, exclusive of masses, &c., for the repose of the souls of the dead, marriages, &c. have been regularly performed. It is opened at five o'clock a.m., until one p.m. and from half past three o'clock p.m. to six or eight p.m."

THE MILLENIUM.—Three lectures on the Millennium, from Revelation and Prophecy, and of the preparation of Great Britain for the eventful year 1849, have been delivered during the week by a Mr. Benjamin Orwen in the Arcade Long-room, Sunderland.—Tyne Mercury.

DURHAM CATHEDRAL.—The prebendaries of this cathedral have, in the course of the last twelve years, given up no less a sum than 100,000*l.* towards the foundation of the Durham University, and 120,000*l.* towards augmenting the poorer livings in the diocese. [Poor fellows!]

CHELSEA.

I.

When old Canute the Dane
Was merry England's king,
A thousand years ago and more,
As ancient "rymours" sing!
His boat was rowing down the Cam
At eve, one summer day,
Where Ely's tall Cathedral peered

II.

Anon, sweet music on his ear,
Comes floating from the fane,
And listening, as with all his soul,
Sat old Canute the Dane;
And reverend did he doff his crown,
To join the monkish prayer,
While swelled old lauds and litanies
Upon the stilly air.

III.

Now, who shall guide on Hudson's breast,
At eve of summer day,
And cometh where St. Peter's tower
Peers o'er his coasting way;
A moment, let him slack his oar,
And speed more still along,
His ear shall catch those very notes
Of litany and song.

IV.

The Church that sung those anthem prayers
A thousand years ago,
Is singing yet by silver Cam,
And here by Hudson's flow;
And GLORIAS that thrilled the heart
Of old Canute the Dane,
Are rising yet, at morn and eve,
From Chelsea's student train.

V.

VENITE EXULTEMUS, there
Those ancient scholars sung,
And JUBILATE DOMINE
The vaulted alleys rung;
And our gray pile with trembling oft
Beneath the organ's roar,
When here those very matin songs,
And old TE DEUM pour.

VI.

And where are kings and empires now
Since then that went and came?
But Holy Church is praying yet,
A thousand years the same!
And these that sing shall pass away;
New choirs their room shall fill;
Be sure thy children's children here,
Shall hear those chimings still.

VII.

For not like kingdoms of the world,
The holy Church of God!
Though earthquake shocks be rocking it,
And tempest is abroad;
Unshaken as eternal hills,
Unmovable it stands,
A mountain that shall fill the earth,
A fane unbuilt by hands!

VIII.

Though years fling ivy o'er it,
Its cross peers high in air;
And reverend with majestic age,
Eternal youth is there!
O mar! her holy battlements,
And her foundations strong;
And hear within her ceaseless voice;
And her unending song!

IX.

O yet that in these latter days
The citadel defend,
Perchance for you, the Saviour said,
I'm with you to the end;
Stand therefore, girt about, and hold
Your burning lamps in hand,
And standing, listening for your Lord,
And till he cometh stand!

X.

The gates of hell shall ne'er prevail,
Against our holy home.
But O be wakeful, sentinels,
Until the Master come!
The night is spent—but listen ye,
For on its deepest calm,
What marvel if the cry be heard,
The marriage of the Lamb?—Churchman.

THE "SABBATH."—The following is a letter in the Times of Wednesday, signed "One who keeps the Lord's Day":—"Sir Andrew Agnew, in his inimitable lecture to her Majesty, has asserted that Scotland is a 'Sabbath-observing country in the true scriptural sense.' Sunday may, perhaps, have been the Sabbath of the Patriarchs; but not even in the 'scriptural sense,' Sir Andrew can prove, that any day but Saturday is ever once called the Sabbath in the Scriptures; Sunday being called either 'the Lord's Day' in the New Testament, or else 'the first day of the week.' With regard to the absolute obligation of keeping the Lord's Day, Scripture is silent. The Puritans knew this well, and, though the Apostle has said to the Colossians (chap. ii. ver. 16, 17), 'Let no man judge you in meat or in drink, in respect of an holiday, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days; which are a shadow of things to come, but the body is of Christ,' they insisted that the Judaical observance was binding. They would not appeal to the authority of the church universal, for it would have proved too much. They would have been forced to admit also the necessity of an apostolical succession; and, whatever may have been the constitution of the primitive church, they could not deny, that since the year 140, at the very latest, none but bishops had been ordained with power to continue that succession. Saturday was always called the Sabbath by the early Christians, as it still is in the south of Europe, and in the journals of Parliament. When the Puritans, in 1621, brought in a bill 'for the better observance of the Sabbath, usually called Sunday, Mr. Shepherd remarked, that it should have been entitled, 'a Bill for the better observance of Saturday, commonly called Sunday,' as Saturday was Dies Sabbati. He was more witty than wise; for the 'Sir Andrews' of his day had him reprimanded on his knees, and expelled the House."

The LIBERATOR then proceeded to address the assembly—He said—It is utterly impossible to find language adequate to describe the sensations of delight with which I once again address this assembly (cheers.) I had imagined that my voice was at least suspended until the month of May next (cheers;) but the merry month of May has come upon us eight months sooner than we anticipated—(loud cheers;) and we can now rejoice as merry as May birds (cheers.) But seriously, we have most important reasons for rejoicing—a victory was never yet more worthily won—a triumph was never yet more honestly earned (cheers.) We have had a triumph over combination and foul conspiracy—we have had a triumph over the crime of jury packing—we have had a triumph for the constitution—and we are entitled to enjoy the pleasure and satisfaction of that triumph.

"SIT LAUS PLENA, SIT SONORA,
MENTIS JUBILATIO."

Yes, it is a moment in which the jubilation of the mind should with proper decorum, but with entire fervour, rejoice over the scenes of our triumph, and rejoice in the victory we have obtained (cheers.) I am unable to describe the sensations that overpower my mind—the first thing that comes upon it with certainty is, that the Repeal must be carried (cheers.) Nothing can impede the Repeal but misconduct on our part. This triumph is a proof that the Repeal is in its progress too awful and too important to be retarded by any means but your own misconduct (hear.) It is not by man's efforts that we have achieved this victory over fraud, and conspiracy, and injustice (cheers.) It is not by man's means that so great a change has taken place in one short week (cheers.) Last week everything was triumphant on the part of the persecutor and oppressor—this week the persecutor and oppressor keep perfectly silent (cheers) and they are allowed quietly to enjoy their silence; but the palm of victory is with us—the shouts and exultation of triumph at our side (loud cheers.) No, it was not man did it. We were defeated in every part of the progress of the case. The judges refused us the ordinary privileges respecting the indictment during the progress of the trial (hear.) Every motion that was made was sure to be negatived by the bench and every effort made to procure materials for the defence was sure to be counteracted by the judges. Every hope of acquittal was taken away by the selected jury (hisses.) We appealed to the House of Lords. Even there we found seven out of the nine judges giving the most astonishingly absurd opinion that ever was pronounced by men; but it was not the less against us for being absurd (hear, hear.) If I ever entertained any hope, I had long abandoned it, and when the account came to me that the decision was in our favour—the attorneys rushed into our presence, and one of them did me the honour of embracing me as he announced it—yet, notwithstanding that kiss, I could not believe—I could not think it possible that the judgment was reversed; even with the knowledge that it must be reversed or the attorneys would not be there, half an hour had elapsed before I could believe it (hear, hear.) I repeat, it was not a work of man, but a blessing bestowed by Providence on the virtuous people of Ireland (loud cheers.) It is a gift of Providence, and bowing in submission before the Throne of God we acknowledge it as a mercy on His part (cheers.) I am sure I cannot offend the prejudices of any persuasion by this assertion; it is a doctrine of the Catholic, as well as of the Protestant Church, that God deigns to interfere in the affairs of man. As Christians they believe it. They find practical proof of it in the ~~bottom~~ Common Prayer. Prayers are offered by them for temporal advantages—for heat, for rain, for variation of the season, and other temporal advantages (hear, hear.) I cannot, therefore, shock any prejudice by the assertion—I would not shock any prejudices if they existed; but none can exist, for this is equally the doctrine of the Protestant and Catholic Church (hear, hear.) And when I recollect that the millions of the faithful people of Ireland have offered up their hands in supplication to God—that the priests at their altars have offered up multitudinous sacrifices—that the holy and revered Sisters of Charity and other religious orders have prayed to the Lord—that the Catholics of England have joined us in prayer—that the entire of Belgium have offered up similar prayers—that along the banks of the multitudinous streams of the Rhine the same supplications have been offered—when I recollect that, oh! I feel convinced they have been heard, and we stand disenthralled, and free before you—thankful to God, and grateful for the blessings of all good men (cheers.) It is a glorious victory, and it is fitting that such a cause should have such a victory. For in that cause there is nothing selfish or individual—nothing to advance the interests or fortunes of particular persons (cheers.) There was involved in this prosecution the great principles of the British constitution—the right to liberty was involved in that prosecution. By that prosecution the government attempted to prevent the peaceful meeting of peaceful citizens to petition the legislature for redress of grievances. Or if not to prevent it altogether, to do worse—to make a mockery and delusion of the right, and take away its real value and importance.—For what is the assertion in the indictment? It is this—that the multitudes of persons who assembled at those meetings were so great, that they necessarily created intimidation. They said that they were guilty of conspiracy, because so many peaceful persons were present. Somebody must be afraid that the law would be violated (cheers.) If that principle were once established, and this foul judgment affirmed, the consequence would necessarily be, that the greater the number of persons who were agreed in opinion that an amelioration of any law was required—and you are not entitled to seek for the alteration of an existing law except a number of persons agree with you in opinion that such alteration is necessary. The more grievous the law you wanted to have altered, the more convinced the public at large was of the necessity for alteration—the greater the number of persons that concurred in opinion that alteration was expedient, the more criminal on their part to look for it; and, therefore, their only chance of seeking to effect their object by the force of public opinion was taken away. It would be only safe to seek for some insignificant measure which enlisted the advocacy but of a few individuals; but when you had the voice of the people with you, which is the voice of God, you were to be persecuted, and every foul advantage taken of you (hear, hear, and cheers.) This would lead to the annihilation of the right of petition, and therefore our triumph is a triumph in the holiest and best of causes. It is a triumph without which the throne of the Monarch would be insecure, for it is to the adoption and circulation of public opinions that Queen Victoria owes her throne (hear, hear.) The family of Savoy, the Stuarts, would be on the throne at the present moment if it were not a legitimate principle of the British constitution that even the monarch is not secure from the overwhelming effect of public opinion (hear, hear.) That insecurity must arise through the misconduct of the governing power, and therefore this attempt on the part of the government to annihilate the right of petition was treason to the monarch on the throne (hear, hear.) When I take to you by and by of the impeachment of the present government, I will demonstrate that their acts amounted to treason to the throne, by taking away one of its props, as sanctioned by discussion, and enforced by public opinion (hear, hear.)—There is another branch of our triumph that cannot be omitted—the vindication of the trial by jury (cheers.)—They will not have another selected jury, or at least they will not have this as a bad precedent for its selection (hear.) The list was shortened, I will not say by whom—the list was fraudulently diminished, I will not say by whom; but I trust the voice of the public will compel an inquiry into the subject, and that a competent tribunal will say—who committed the crime (cheers). The principle of packed juries has been put an end to; a principle which was sought to be consecrated, and sustained, and we have defeated those who sought to consecrate that bad and unjust principle (cheers.) We are triumphant over those who would destroy the right of trial by jury and the right before these tribunals of the country to defend the lives and properties of the Queen's subjects (cheers.) The constitution has been vindicated—the trial by jury has been vindicated—and we stand here to-day rejoicing in having effected the triumph of both (cheers;) and I am happy to be one of the instruments of announcing to the public, and to the world, our joy at this complete triumph (cheers.) We have another great cause of triumph also—for what were the chances for the Repeal agitation if this verdict had been affirmed? It might have some chance to be sure from the consistency and determination of the Irish people, but now how gloriously it stands (hear, hear, and immense cheers.)—Now, we can call together hundreds of thousands in peaceful majesty and tranquil might, determined to violate no law—without one particle of intimidation, but resolved to declare in their monster meetings that the Repeal is absolutely necessary for Ireland (cheers.) There is no impediment now to the peaceful conduct of the Repeal cause—there is nothing (keeping within the law) to prevent our meeting—our resolving—our organising—our fortifying ourselves by the increase of the number of Repealers on the registry roll; there is nothing to prevent our adoption of every other legal means to insure success, and pouring in petitions until we make the table of the House of Commons reel beneath the load of the complaints of the people of Ireland (cheers.) Our constitutional rights are preserved—we have the guarantee of the trial by jury to protect us, and we stand both on one and the other (cheers.) I here proclaim that to be the unanimous sentiment of the Irish people—the sentiment that pervades them from the Giant's Cause way to Cape Clear—from Connemara to the Hill of Howth—and their sentiments will soon be too loudly expressed to be neglected, too wise and too moderately regulated, to find any human being possessed of common sense and honesty disposed to offer it resistance (loud cheers.) Well, we have been successful—what is better, that success is on the merits (loud cheers.) It has been said, and will no doubt be repeated, that the decision of the House of Lords was a decision founded on legal crotchets and technical points; but it was no such thing—it was a direct decision on the merits (hear, hear, and loud cheers;) and I will prove it to any man even though he is not a lawyer in less than five minutes (hear.) The sixth and seventh counts of the indictment were counts for conspiracy to hold meetings to intimidate. Those sixth and seventh counts were declared by the judges here, every one of them, even Judge Perrin, to be good counts. Judgment was pronounced on them—the judges here gave judgment on every one of those counts—they declared they were counts containing criminal matter of the most culpable nature. Judge Burton passed sentence on me particularly on those counts and on the other traversers, but directing them especially to me. All the judges of England are of opinion that those are bad counts—there is no difference of opinion on that point amongst them. All the judges here, even including Judge Perrin, were of opinion that the counts were good (hear, hear.) I can tell you this, that when the judges here were considering their judgment, Judge Perrin, as junior judge, was first asked what he thought the judgment should be? He said ~~one~~ months' imprisonment. Judge Crampton was next asked for his opinion, and he said two years (hisses.) Judge Burton was then asked what the sentence should be, and he said one year. Chief Justice Pennefather was asked what the judgment should be, and he said two years (hisses.) Two of them were for two years, one for six months, and one for twelve months, and Judge Perrin very properly, as he could do no better, joined with Judge Burton, and they condescended to pass a sentence on me of only one year's imprisonment (hear, hear.) That was an illegal sentence (cheers.) I had as good a right to send them to jail as they had to send me to jail (cheers and laughter.) Let us now come to the seven judges in England. This was curious. They said, there are some of those counts good, the sixth and seventh are certainly bad, but we will presume that the judges of the Irish Court of Queen's Bench did not intend to fix any punishment on the bad counts. Why, their judgments were published and printed, and circulated; every body could read them, and had been reading them—it was publicly announced in those judgments that were printed and circulated, and in every body's hands, and used by counsel at the bar, that they had passed the sentence specially on those bad counts, so that in point of fact there was no doubt of it whatever. It was as clear as the sun at noonday that the judgment was passed against us on those bad counts; but seven wise-aces of judges in England presumed that it was otherwise, and they gave their decision on that presumption. That is, their decision was founded upon a lie. That is the proper name for it. They called it a presumption of law. I will not waste my breath in describing it. They called it a presumption of law, but I call it a lie (cheers,) and that judgment was affirmed by Lord Lyndhurst (groans,) and by that indescribable wretch Brougham (hisses and laughter,) upon this ground, that the lie should be supposed to be true, and that we should be punished against the fact and in contradiction of the record itself, for the fact was not only public, but the sentence on the record set forth "for the offences aforesaid"—of course including every one, and necessarily including those on the two bad counts (hear, hear.) So the record told the truth, but Lord Lyndhurst and Lord Brougham said it lied to punish us—the judges said it lied to punish us. However, blessed be Heaven! three men were found honest enough to attend to the truth and give up the lie—to look to the fact and not mind the presumption; and I now tell you to rejoice, for the judgment was quashed on the merits, and the technicalities were entirely on the other side (cheers.) There was an attempt to confound truth and fact by matter of law, but justice was vindicated. The truth was with us, and I now make them a compliment of the lie for their portion of it (loud cheers.) And now I am going to make atonement to a public body—a class of men whom I often assailed, and certainly in some degree they deserved to be assailed. But, after all, how infinitely superior to the Tories are the Whigs (hear, hear.) The principle of Toryism is double; it takes as much of public rights from each individual as it can, and amalgamates them together for the benefit of the aristocracy (hear, hear.) But where Toryism is most terrific is in its anxiety for injustice, putting on the bench partial judges. The Tories in every century in our history may have their trail traced by the character of the men they make judges, for in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred they selected most prejudiced and partial men for the office of judge (hear, hear.) In later times in England, within the last thirty or forty years, there was less of party spirit approaching the bench, and the distinction between Whig and Tory had almost ceased. The evil still continued to exist in this country—I need not allude to individuals (hear, hear,)—but I ask if the support I gave to the Whigs could for another year have kept them in office would you not have Chief Baron Brady now Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench?—probably you would have Mr. Pigot Chief Baron, and Moore and Monahan in the place of Jackson and Lefroy (hear, hear.) Was I wrong then in giving the support I did to the Whigs, for you never would have heard of this prosecution if Brady were Chief Justice (hear, hear.) The Whigs would have appointed Moore, and Monahan, and Hatchell to be judges; the Tories have appointed Litton, and Lefroy, and Jackson, and you all know how they respect the reverence that a Catholic has for the obligation of an oath (hear, hear.) It is enough for me to know this, that the Whigs have sought to give us good judges, and the Tories have sought to give us partizan judges—in former times (loud cheers and laughter.) I was afraid the thing would happen again, and I therefore supported the Whigs. But I never gave a vote for the Whigs inconsistent with my public and political principles. I defy the press of England to point out one vote I gave for them inconsistent with the public principles of my life.—All I did for them was to attend in the house, to give them my support on ordinary occasions, with a view to speed their bills through the house (hear, hear.) And now see the men whom they made judges. They made Lord Cottenham a judge (cheers.) I believe it will be admitted that a better never lived. I would say so good a judge, but I cannot forget one who is now in his cold grave, my dear and lamented friend, Sir Michael O'Loughlen. There was one judge good, but there was never a better judge than Lord Cottenham (hear, hear.) He was something like Chief Baron Brady. He was not a first-rate advocate, though a useful advocate, which shows the distinction that exists between the talents of the advocate and the judicial quality. He possessed most eminently, as Chief Baron Brady does, the judicial quality, and though not so able an advocate as Lord Plunket, both one and the other are superior to him as judges. The next of the three was the Lord Chief Justice of England, Lord Denman (loud cheers.) There have been many great men from time to time on the English bench, but who has shown himself what Lord Denman is (cheers?) He talked of the trial by jury, and said if this course shall continue the trial by jury will become a mockery, a delusion, and a snare (cheers.) Take that, Mr. Attorney-General Smith (hisses.) Read that, Mr. Chief Justice Pennefather (hisses.) Write it on a slip of paper, Mr. Crampton, to mark a place in your prayer book (loud laughter.) A mockery, a delusion, and a snare—that is what the Chief Justice of England declared such a trial by jury to be (cheers.) These are extraordinary times when it can be said that the governing powers pack a jury to make the trial by jury a mockery, a delusion, and a snare (hear, hear.) Oh, how I thank the Chief Justice of England for the words (cheers,) and next to those was Lord Campbell, one of the best common law lawyers that ever lived—a man who was at the head of his profession for several years. He paid a short visit to this country, and he told me he was not a week here when he became thoroughly Irish (cheers.) I think it happens that with his shrewd Scotch head, he has an Irish heart, and he does honour to his profession by the way he struggled, under foot the lying pretence by which this judgment was sought to be sustained (hear, hear, and cheers.) Yes, we owe a debt of gratitude to the Whigs, and as I was never tardy, in censuring them whenever I considered that their conduct merited reprehension, so I am now equally eager to award them that meed of eulogy which it is their unquestionable right to receive when they have deserved well at our hands (hear, hear.) We owe them a deep debt of gratitude for that honest principle of attachment to the cause of truth and justice which has guided their conduct invariably in the selection of good judges. Had they put bad judges on the bench I would have been equally ready to assail as I am now to applaud. But I rejoice with an exceeding great joy at the escape we have had from the fangs of injustice—an escape for which we are, under Providence, indebted to the dignified impartiality by which the bench has been ornamented through the judicial appointments of the Whigs. The great and learned Lord Denman was toiling for many and many a year as a barrister in the Court of Queen's Bench in England before any prospect of the ermine was opened before him, and had there been no intermission of Tory misrule he would never have been upon the bench. If the Tories had been incessantly in the ascendant, Lord Cottenham would never have sat upon the woolsack, and they would also have taken especial care to exclude from judicial office a man who is too honest for them—Lord Campbell (hear, hear.) It was the exclusion of the Tory party from power even for a season which gave to England the lustre, the glory, the honour, yes, and I will also add, the security and safety which now happily appertains to the administration of justice in that country (hear, hear.) Providence has mercifully interfered in our behalf, and it is to that mighty heavenly power, by which Monarchs reign and Princes decree justice, that our thanks are pre-eminently due; but Providence selects instruments for the carrying out of His great designs, and I am sure that I will not leave myself open to any imputation of profaneness when I speak in terms of sincere gratitude of the great exertions that were made in our cause by the Morning Chronicle newspaper (hear.)—By its zealous advocacy of our rights, and by its faithful attachment to the honest principles of judicial determination, it has done much indeed to entitle itself to our confidence and gratitude (cheers.) In the history of England there is no instance of a public journal doing such service to public liberty as the Morning Chronicle has done by the simplicity, the perspicuity, the talent, the eloquence, the acuteness with which it pointed at the defects in the judgment, and demonstrated the grounds upon which it ought to be reversed (hear, hear.) I am happy in having an opportunity of awarding to that excellent paper the praise to which it is undoubtedly justly entitled (cheers.) While the Tory papers were endeavouring to distort every thing to the prejudice of the traversers, and at the sacrifice of truth and justice were endeavouring to make the worse appear the better cause, the Morning Chronicle day after day was sending forth arguments and facts which would have been a consolation to us, and a means of retribution if we had been defeated in appeal, but which now—in our hour of triumph—invests it with an irresistible claim upon our praise and gratitude (hear, hear, and cheers.) One word more upon this part of the subject, and I have done. I wish just to offer a single observation in reference to a very dear friend of mine, whom perhaps we have treated somewhat too harshly (hear, hear.) I allude to my beloved friend, Richard Sheil (hear, hear, and cheers.) I was vexed and angry with him at the time that he should have uttered any words to which the meaning could possibly be attached of soliciting a favour on my part from Sir Robert Peel. Ah! he ought to have known me better! He ought to have known that I would have rotted in jail before I would condescend to accept a favour from Peel (hear, hear, and loud cheers.) I said from the commencement—I announced it to the world, that come what might there would be no compromise or shrinking (hear, hear.)—Compromise or shrinking there has been none, and there is not a man of us who would not have died in jail rather than sully our hands by receiving the slightest concession from our enemies (hear, hear.)—Sheil was wrong in that instance; but he is one of those men who can afford to be wrong once, for his country owes him a deep debt of gratitude. Oh, I cannot forget his past career—his glorious career (hear, hear, and cheers.) I cannot forget how he ornamented and made interesting our struggle for emancipation. When I was going on with my dull, prosy speech-making—wearing the public ear by the monotony of my tones and accents, and by the continual repetition of the same facts. Sheil used to burst forth in all the dazzling effulgence of intellectual glory, irradiating us with the corruscations of his genius and the illumination of his beautiful mind (loud cheers.) We owed him much, and even upon the present occasion he is not without strong claims on our gratitude. He it was who in that very speech with which we found fault got from Peel what has drawn on him the scorn of all Europe, and what must damn him with all posterity—the assertion that we had a fair trial (hear, hear, and loud cheers.) That assertion alone is worth much, and from this spot I thank my friend Sheil for having elicited it from Peel (loud cheers.) Well now, as we have succeeded upon their merits—as we boast of our successes, and attribute it, as in duty bound, to that Providence which governs nations, how are we to conduct ourselves for the future? The necessities of the hour, and the vast importance of passing even which are casting their shadows before, render it imperative upon us that we should be discreet, but it is equally incumbent upon that we should act with firmness (hear, hear, and cheers.) It behoves us to act in the fi spirit of conciliation (hear, hear.) We must seek to increase our numbers by all proper and becoming means, but one jot, one particle of our principle we ought not and cannot abate (loud cheers.) Come what will we are bound, irrevocably bound to the Repeal, and our struggle for legislative independence will end in our graves, or it will end in the triumphant establishment of a parliament in College-green (hear, hear.) We are a sanguine, but we are a steadfast people, and we ought to be encouraged by what has occurred (hear.) The anti-Irish (I will not talk of the Orangemen, for, after all, the Orange is as good a colour as the green, when the heart is in the right place (hear, hear, and cheers.) the anti-Irish party are discouraged and disconcerted, and wherefore should they not? Ours is the triumph—ours the jubilation!—and we must brace ourselves to the struggle with renewed energy. How are we to act for the future?—Conciliation is our primary duty. How are we to act for the future? I think that the best way to answer that question is to look to what we have done up to the present moment—to observe in what a spirit we have acted. We have been engaged, and are engaged in a mighty struggle. Have we injured anybody in that struggle?—Have we insulted anybody in that struggle?—Have we oppressed anybody in that struggle? (hear, hear, and cheers.) Have we been guilty of any turbulence, of any tumult, of any deed of violence? No, blessed be Heaven, we have not. We met by millions, and, not only was no act of violence attempted, but such was our forbearance one towards the other, that not even an accident anywhere occurred (hear, hear.) I turn to my Protestant fellow-countrymen—my Protestant brothers,—men who have the spirit of the Protestants—around me, though as yet they have not had the manliness to exhibit it, and I ask them what are they afraid of? What are you afraid of? Did we threaten? Did we menace? Did we overawe? We were strong enough to commit violence, but nothing save the spirit of conciliation and love for each other could have brought us together in such multitudinous masses without violence. In the midst of a people who love me and trust me—with more power in my hands than any Monarch in Europe enjoys (vehement applause, waving of hats and handkerchiefs)—so situated, how have I demeaned myself? But first, how did I acquire that power? I acquired it because of the conviction which every man, woman, and child feels that I would not abuse it (hear, hear.) I acquired it and I have retained it because I was congenial in opinion with the millions of my countrymen, and because they were perfectly persuaded that in the exercise of the power with which by their confidence they invested me, I would sedulously guard against the commission of any crime whatsoever. I have kept my compact, but I never could have done this without the assistance and co-operation of the Catholic clergy (hear, hear, and cheers.) They saw the jealous scrutiny with which our minutest movements were watched by our Protestant brethren—they entered unreservedly into my views, and here is all the secret of my success. They knew me—they appreciated me. They knew that I was the first apostle and founder of that sect of politicians whose cardinal doctrine is this, that the greatest and most desirable of all political changes may be achieved by moral means alone, and that no human revolution is worth the effusion of one single drop of human blood. Human blood is no cement for the temple of human liberty. It is the weakest as well as the guiltiest expedient that can be had recourse to, for it has a crumbling quality in it which in the course of a little time must bring to the ground any edifice how stately soever it may appear. No, my Lord Mayor, my political disciples are apostles of that sect who shudder at the thought of human blood, and who maintain that the most glorious of all political revolutions may be achieved by moral and peaceful means alone. The Catholic clergy saw that this was our theory, and they also saw that our practice was conformable to it. Protestants of Ireland, what objection can you have to the principle we have adopted as our own? The principle assuredly is one which must challenge your approval and admiration; and if we can show, as we can, that we who have ever professed this principle have ever acted in perfect consistency with it, why should you not give us your confidence and co-operation? The conviction that our practice is in all respects in strict conformity with our professions, is daily gaining ground with the most liberal-minded and enlightened in the community (hear, hear.) Of this we had a fresh indication even yesterday (cheers.) When my revered friend, the Most Rev. Dr. Murray (I am almost ashamed to call such a man by so familiar a title)—when, I say, at the head of his priests, that venerable prelate sent up his prayers to the throne of grace, and raised his pure hands to God in grateful thanksgiving for the mercies we had received, think you not that we had a new and invaluable evidence of the purity of our cause? If our cause were not a moral and a pure one—if we were not intent upon attaining a holy object by holy means, think you that we would receive the countenance of such a man? Is not Dr. Murray a loyal man—is he not a man whose allegiance is unpurchaseable? Yes, assuredly he is. His testimony to the purity of our conduct is consistent with the purity of his life, and I am truly glad to observe that we had yesterday his testimony to the propriety of our conduct (loud cheers.) It is not alone in the hour of our triumph and exultation that we are faithful to the theory which we profess as the fundamental principle of our cause. Under circumstances of extraordinary trial and exasperation we have been found true to it. When the foul conspiracy against our rights and liberties was hatching in the purlieus of the Castle, and when the Attorney-General taunted us and insulted us, calling us “foul conspirators,” and at the time when they were bringing regiment after regiment to Ireland (though, after all, what can regiments do against a nation)—what was our conduct at that trying period? Their leader, him for whom they condescend to feel an affection which his heart may be grateful for, which his heart is deeply grateful for, but which he can never merit: that leader they saw torn from amongst them, committed to a common jail, and they also saw that his beloved son was most scandalously included in the same indictment. Yes, I say "most scandalously" included. Would it not have been sufficient punishment for my son John to see what I was punished without bringing him too into the indictment? Yet this the Attorney-General did. Oh, malignant vinegar-cruet on two legs I see it all (hear, hear, loud cheers, and laughter.) It was John O'Connell's opposition to you at Youghal—it was John O'Connell's defeat of you at Youghal, a defeat proved before a committee of the house, that threw him into the indictment (hear, hear.) I am sure that this was the fact; but even if it were not so the people believed it. They know that the Attorney-General had a reasonable ground of irritation against me. I had impeached his father in the House of Commons, and upon one motion for impeachment I was successful. I respect the filial piety which prompted him to prosecute me (loud laughter,) and I heartily thank him for it; but even the decencies of enmity might have suggested to him the propriety of leaving my son out of his prosecution. The people saw all this, and yet with what magnanimity, with what admirable composure did they demean themselves! They know their own strength. But now that it is all over I ask was there ever anything so unstatesmanlike, to say the least of it, as the conduct of the government? They inundated the country with troops, and then they locked them up in barracks and punched loop-holes in the walls, which, if they had tongues, would seem to say, "the troops are not enough to keep the country, and there must be something wherein to keep the troops." Believe me the wily Louis Philippe was a vigilant observer of England's policy towards Ireland, and were it not for that policy Tangier would be to-day untouched, Mogadore would be still whole, and Isly would not be stained with the blood of the Moors (loud cries of hear, hear.) Their policy towards us was folly and absurdity; we knew it to be such though we did not say so at the time. The people saw how they were treated, and they felt it deeply. But was there any aggression attempted upon any man's life, liberty, or property? Was any indignity offered to any of the Queen's soldiery? No; peace, order, tranquillity, and decorum reigned throughout the country, and when upon one or two occasions the opposite party attempted some light outrage against us, we did not prosecute them, but acted towards them in a friendly spirit and forgave them. When, therefore, I come to consider what shall be our conduct for the future, may I not be permitted to revert with honest pride to our conduct, in the past (hear.) If the people in every town, village, and hamlet throughout the length and breadth of the land were not to a man imbued with the same spirit of forbearance and conciliation, do you suppose that some act of violence would not have been somewhere attempted, and particularly in some remote village, where there were few soldiers and a large population? Some act of violence would have been attempted—some unkindness would have been exhibited to the military; but nothing of the kind anywhere occurred. Oh! Protestant fellow-countrymen, look at what our demeanour has been; and if we so conducted ourselves when persecuted, insulted, and aggrieved—with our leaders cast into prison, and juries packed against us—how can you be apprehensive that in the day of our prosperity our natures would undergo a change, and that when we are well-treated, and our rights are conceded to us, we would be brutal and overbearing (hear, hear)? No, people of Ireland, in the crisis of your fate you showed yourselves be worthy of your high destinies. Why should I not be delighted to suffer for you? Why should I not be delighted to die for you (loud and long continued cheering)? No, no, not a single outrage—not a single insult was offered to anybody—no danger arose through your instrumentality to life or property anywhere. This great crisis has passed over, as your enemies did not intend that it should pass over, without blood—for I have no hesitation in declaring my conviction, that there were men belonging to the government of Ireland who intended to fill the plains of Clontarf with the blood, not of the enemies of Ireland but of the Irish (hear, hear.) Ah! Sir (turning to Mr. Smith O'Brien) your ancestors shed the blood of the Danes there (loud cheers.) I feel it my duty, distinctly to express this my conviction, for I question not that it will be asserted by our enemies in the House of Commons, that were it not for the interposition of Sir Edward Blake—there would have been a massacre that day (hear and laughter.) Could anything be more basely false than such an assertion? I had barely sufficient time to issue my counter-proclamation, but still I had time sufficient and the people were determined to obey it (hear, hear.) What brought the military there the next day? The hustings had been levelled to the ground before twelve o'clock on the night preceding, so that there was not the slightest appearance anywhere of any intention to hold a meeting, nor was there any accommodation for a meeting. My proclamation was extensively circulated in the neighbourhood and for a circuit of many miles around, and no indication was anywhere visible of any intention on the part of the people to assemble. Under those circumstances, what brought the military there? I trust that I will be yet able to get an answer to this question in the House of Commons, and if the English people had any remnant of the love of justice in their breasts I hope that, with their assistance, I may be enabled to find out who it was had the atrocity to marshal out against an unarmed unoffending people the military force which was paraded on that occasion (hear, hear.)—The government issued a proclamation against that meeting, as you are aware, and you may remember that I contrasted it with the Welch proclamation. In Wales there was turbulence and turbulence, too, of a most serious character, involving bloodshed, murder, and popular violence of all description. In Ireland no act of violence was even attempted, and yet, mark the difference between the two proclamations. The Welch proclamation merely called upon the duly-appointed constables to assist in preserving the peace—whereas the Clontarf proclamation called upon all well-disposed persons, no matter what their occupation or business, to co-operate and assist in working it out. Why, some of Gregg's men might have sallied out under cover of that proclamation, and if they had discovered that in point of fact they were authorised in so doing, no man can tell me what mischief might have been done, or what blood might have been shed (hear, hear.) They imagine they can crush, but Europe shall know of their proceedings—the world shall know of their proceedings, and the British minister shall either refuse me an inquiry, with a sward-dice which will earn for him universal reprobation, or else an inquiry will be granted which will be in its results most important to Ireland and which will cover the minister with confusion and disgrace (hear, hear, and loud cheers.) But the conduct of the people has been admirable, and proves that unbounded confidence may be reposed in them. They have shown they are fit for self government by the complete control they have exercised over their own passions, and I am sanguine in my anticipation that the day is fast approaching when this truth will be universally acknowledged amongst high-minded and enlightened Protestants. Yes, my Protestant brethren, here is a people fit to govern themselves—fit to be your companions and co-equals in governing a country which is alike dear to us all. Every day affords yet another gratifying evidence of the progress of our cause.—Look here, I hold in my hand a pamphlet which has just emanated from the pen of Mr. Grey Porter. Who is Mr. Grey Porter? He is the High Sheriff of the county Fermanagh—the Protestant High Sheriff of a Protestant county (hear, hear!) That you may know the spirit of the book, I will read you three sentences from the title page. They are as follows:—"The Union of 1801, 41 Geo. III., cap. 47 (all on one side) does and always will draw away from Ireland her men of skill, genius, capital, and rank—all who raise, strengthen and distinguish a nation—a Federal, the only fair union between Great Britain and Ireland inevitable, and most desirable for both islands." (hear, hear, and loud cheers.) These are Mr. Grey Porter's principles. He shows the evils of the Union, and then he declares himself an advocate for its repeal, and the establishment of a Federal parliament (hear, hear, and cheers.) The Protestant High Sheriff of a Protestant county! Will he be superseded? Will he receive a billet-doux from the Chancellor, think you? Will the contumelious little English dog who breaks country justices (loud laughter)—(I call him a dog, because he barks at our Magistrates) (laughter)—will the courteous and contumelious little man dare to supersede Mr. Grey Porter? I am sure I do not want him to do so, but I am confident that Sir Edward Sugden will not have the political courage to do so (hear, hear.) He will not attempt it I am sure, though he would break country Magistrates to no end. Mr. Grey Porter deserves the highest praise that can be given to man. There are some mistakes as to facts in his book, but there is a general principle of nationality, in it which I cannot but admire—there is "Ireland for the Irish" in it, and therefore I like it (hear, and cheers.) From this spot I announce to Mr. Grey Porter that whenever he pleases to seek our co-operation—when- ever he thinks fit to join us, he shall command that leading position in this hall to which he is justly entitled by his talents, his station, and his fortune (hear, and cheers.) What need he fear. He knows we are loyal men. I would upon my own responsibility dissolve the Repeal Association to-morrow, if it did any act dangerous to the connexion between the two countries or dangerous to our allegiance to our sovereign (hear, hear.) I offer him as distinguished a place in our struggle as his ambition can aspire to (hear, hear.) Perhaps he may give heed to my words as soon as he hears them. At all events I am certain that the day will come when he will hearken to me (cheers.) Conciliation must be our motto. Are not such men as Mr. Grey Porter worth conciliating? Oh, I would give my heart's blood to bring over such men as he is (loud cheers.) Could we have a nobler object to achieve than the conversion of such men? Can any man be a true-hearted Repealer who would not delight to see Mr. Grey Porter at the head of the movement? Again I offer him our co-operation (hear, hear.) I don't want to be leader; I will pull the plough as well as I can, but I will concede to Mr. Grey Porter the guiding of the reins and the directing of the wheels. And now I tell you three different subjects are rushing on my mind.—The first relates to the meeting at Clontarf. It was called legally—it was illegally prevented from meeting (hear, hear.) We are bound to vindicate a great principle. Does that principle extend so far as to render it imperative on us to hold that meeting; or has the principle been already sufficiently vindicated without holding? For a long time I thought it would be right and befitting to call that meeting over again for the vindication of a principle; but after much consideration I am now rather inclined to the opinion that the principle has been sufficiently vindicated by the House of Lords, having been placed on eternal record by the decision of Lord Cottenham, Lord Denman and Lord Campbell. I am therefore at present disposed to doubt if it be necessary to hold the meeting; if it be not necessary we will not hold it, for it might perhaps excite bad feelings, and be interpreted by our adversaries as savouring of the insolence of triumph. However, on this day week I will propose that it be referred to a committee to consider the question in every light. As my mind is inclined at present I am certainly against holding it, but I am open to argument. I will listen to others, and if I am convinced that for the sake of popular rights, it is desirable that the meeting should be held, hold it I will (hear, hear, and cheers.) The next subject to which I will allude is a plan which I proposed frequently last year, and which, though never completely matured, was maturing in my mind when I was snatched from amongst you—I mean the formation of a preservative society in Ireland (hear, hear.) This is a subject full of legal difficulty, and which must consequently be approached cautiously and by degrees. We were prevented from considering it by the proclamation and the subsequent proceedings, but it is a thing well worthy of consideration. I proposed that 300 gentlemen should meet in Dublin—that the title so to meet should be the handing in of one hundred pounds—that they should have a treasurer for themselves, and be the sole guardians of their own money, but that they should show an interest in the cause, at least to the extent of that sum. I would propose that they should initiate nothing, but that they should correct and control everything in the movement; that the Repeal Association should take no step without their sanction, and that they should be at perfect liberty to point out the course which appears to them the best adapted for the carrying of Repeal. Such a body would comprise such a great number of wealthy men with a large stake in the country as would render any revolutionary movement quite out of the question. They would control us, and influence us, and be men of such station and bearing as could enter into any arrangement with government that might be proposed and was deemed worthy of consideration. I don't think a Federal parliament the best, but I agree with Mr. Grey Porter in making the experiment (hear, hear.) Give me, I say, any parliament that will have the protection of Ireland in its power, and that will be able to protect Ireland, and I don't want to loosen the links of connexion between both countries. But if we arrive at the period of Repeal with a multitudinous body of this description, having no regularly organised organ, the government will, perhaps, dictate a plan to you; and then we may have some persons crying out it is not so bad, and it is better than this, and the government may dictate the terms to you, but they can never dictate to you if you have those three hundred gentlemen assembled (hear, hear.) They will consider the terms of the measure, financial as well as political; they will prepare for the Repeal, and, having secured the materials, we will have the workmen to build up the palace of justice for Ireland (loud cheers.) It may be said that there is illegality in it. I will move for a select committee to inquire into the possibility of forming an assembly of that description, and after we have so formed it, cases will be laid before the most eminent lawyers in England and Ireland, to see if there be anything illegal in the arrangement (cries of hear, hear.) That is my plan. We will not take a single step to bring any man within the law. We will have the opinions of the most eminent legal men in both countries, on a case the preparation of which I will myself superintend, and we will see whether we will not have a second body working for Ireland, not a House of Lords, but having more power than the House of Lords, and composed of the real friends of the people of Ireland (cheers.) Those three hundred individuals, consisting of wealthy merchants and of country gentlemen, will constitute a body that will bring about with great facility the Repeal of the Union (loud cheers.) While in prison, my last thought when laying my head on my pillow, and my first thought on waking was to do something for the good of Ireland (great cheering.) I have modelled the plan in my mind, and am now about to arrange to try it as an experiment. It will be abandoned by me, and also by every other person if it be found impracticable; but it will be embraced with fervour, if it is found to be a ready instrument to bring back the parliament to College-green (cheers.) I have addressed you long (cries of no, no)—but I owe you three months' rent (loud cheers and laughter) and you see I am, LIKE an honest man, paying my debts (laughter.) The third plan I have to propose is one to which I am greatly attached—I want to procure an impeachment of the judges of the Queen's Bench and Attorney General in this country, and of the ministry. Now, I will tell you the grounds on which I ask for that impeachment. I will be as brief as I can, consistently with being clear. The first ground of that impeachment is "the monster indictment—the six and thirty yards of an indictment." Lord Denman said if it were intended to make it impossible for a man to defend himself, such an indictment would effect that object (hear, hear.) It happened to be my case, and being backed by the Repeal rent I was able to pay for it; but what would become of a poor man against whom such an indictment was preferred? Suppose he got a copy from the crown, who would make the brief for counsel? Why it would cost him ten times more money than he every saw to prepare it (hear, hear)—and what is our case to-day might be a poor man's case to-morrow; and a fouler instrument of oppression could never have been concocted (hear, hear, and cheers.) There is my excellent friend, and the friend of Ireland, Richard O'Gorman, he ought to be a proud man to-day. He alone was right, and he had the manliness to proclaim his opinion. He said "we spent five days considering it, and I am sure none of us understood it" (hear.) They did not care about understanding it; they found it to be a true bill, and I am much obliged to them for it. It is not the sole act of the Attorney-General—Sir Edward Sugden was concerned in it, and the Irish government—Sir Robert Peel adopted it. Impeachment is our only remedy, or no man would be safe from monster indictments (cheers.) But what ought the court have done with it? An honest court, acting upon principles of legal integrity, would have quashed that indictment when it was brought before them. They should have said—which Lord Denman said—this was an indictment on which no man could defend himself; take some one or two of the counts and proceed against them, but do not suffocate them by this load of an indictment (cheers.) But did the Queen's Bench do so? They favoured the indictment, nay more, they refused us the copy of the caption and the names of the witnesses; all those things that would be granted to us at once in England, and which we showed it was the constant practice to grant as a matter of course in England (hear, hear.) Instead of discountenancing the monster indictment they made it a babe of their adoption, and fostered it and protected it, and there would be no use of a Court of Impeachment, if we did not bring the judges before a proper tribunal on this subject (hear, hear.) I will prove that the Chief Justice had the air of being counsel for the prosecution. It would be easy to mistake him but for the place he was in for the counsel for the prosecution (hear, hear.) It may be said that I am rash in stating this, but I don't fear their prisons (loud cheers.) I am here, a free born subject of the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, and I am here defending my rights. I impeach a certain line of conduct on the part of a court of justice, whose decision has since been quashed by the House of Lords, without the benefit of those things they deprived us of. I ask for the constitutional doctrine of impeachment to procure justice for Ireland, and for the aid of the people of England, if they wish for justice, to make the impeachment successful. I complain of the conduct of the Chief Justice—I complain of the conduct of Judge Crampton—Crampton used to squeeze up his face at me as if he wanted to terrify me by his lion aspect (loud laughter.) Did it ever occur at a trial before that a Chief Justice borrowed part of the Attorney-General's brief to make up his judgment (hear, hear)? The Attorney-General was prosecuting—the Chief Justice should have been impartial between us, and to make sure of being impartial and not to be misled, he took the Attorney-General's brief to assist him (hear, hear.) That is the fact—that must be heard—and I don't care what the authority of the Chief Justice is. I intend to call upon the people of England to assist the people of Ireland in dragging him before a tribunal that will ascertain if that is conduct to be tolerated (cheers.) My next ground for looking for an impeachment of the Chief Justice is, the indecent charge he gave to the jury. It is admitted by every person that that was a most one-sided charge. It was so totally indefensible that no man in either house of parliament rose to defend it (cries of hear, hear.) It was impeached by every person; it was undefended by every person—and is not that, I ask you, a species of charge that deserves to be investigated by impeachment (cries of hear, hear)? Who is safe from a judge of that description? And for that charge, violent as it is, and illegal, as I contend it to be, we have no remedy by appeal, because it was not on the record; and, therefore, he acted with the most perfect impunity—that is, the most perfect certainty of its effect, without our having any control over him by appeal; and it is another more powerful reason why he should be impeached, and the matter investigated, that we had no other remedy (hear, hear.) They admitted the newspapers in evidence. Mr. Barrett's newspapers were read against me, that had nothing to do with them. The Nation was read against me—passages I disapproved of and condemned were read against me. They were read not only as passages and speeches, but as evidence of the facts alleged in those speeches, as if a witness came on the table, and said Mr. O'Connell did so and so. Judge Perrin certainly, who seemed to be asleep during a great deal of the trial (laughter,) I believe vindicated himself upon that point. But that could not be corrected either by appeal, and therefore that is an additional reason for seeking for a remedy by impeachment (hear, hear.) I will not go into a detail of the packing of the jury, but it is admitted to be packed—nobody denies it now (hear, hear.) A considerable portion of the jury list disappears, and I will tell you what we will be able to prove—we will be able to prove that names were left on that jury list that ought not by law to be on it. That question was not before the court at all, and that is one of the facts to be inquired into (hear, hear.)—Men were on it that ought not to be on it, and men were not on it that should be on it, and a number of Catholics were struck off. I want to know is it to be the doctrine that they will strike off all Repealers? If they do, a tyrannical Attorney-General can put twelve anti-Repealers in the box, and they can do what they like with your property and person (hear, hear.) It was alleged that a fraud was committed, and it was not denied that one way or another the fraud had been committed. What was the duty of the court? The duty of the court was to discountenance a jury got in that way. They ought to have put off the trial until justice could have been done; but one of the articles of Impeachment will be that they countenanced that fraudulent list, and allowed that jury to try us (hear)—Judge Perrin indeed distinguished himself in this part of the case, and so far as one vote could go, makes an excellent contrast with the rest, and gives us an additional reason to believe that we are likely to succeed on impeachment (cheers.) I can prove also that offers of bribery were made to persons by underlings. I know one man that was offered to have his fortune made if he gave information—information that did not exist, but which was not the less acceptable on that account (hear, hear.) Next comes the intermeddling with the jury in making up their verdict. I want to know this—If that jury were got together in that box to-morrow could they be out of that box for twelve months if they were obliged to frame such a verdict as they did out of their own heads (hear, hear)? It is plain on the face of the verdict that some person else helped them to frame it, and I will be able to prove that on our impeachment of it (hear, hear.) I don't think it is necessary to detain you longer upon this part of the case, but I may remind you that the nephew of Chief Justice Pennefather has got an excellent place in the Castle (hear.) Our judges are superior to power, for they cannot be removed, but they are not superior to favour. I don't like to have a Chief Justice's nephew in a place of profit in the Castle, with a prospect of higher promotion before him—the office of secretary of the Lord Lieutenant, to which it is said Lord Heytesbury intends to appoint him. The Chief Justice should take care that his nephew was provided for some place else, and that no inference is drawn between the promotion of the nephew and the opinion of the uncle.—I don't assert the fact of its influencing him, but I declare against the example, and I ask what must be the sentiment in the public mind at finding the nephew thrust forward to the highest station, and the uncle charging in this way at the same time (hear, hear.) There is some story of a relative of Crampton being promoted, but I know nothing of that in sufficient detail to bring it forward now (hear.) I have been three months in jail, and I want to know if they think I am to submit patiently to it. I am not acting from any resentment, for I spent a pleasant three months there. After the first fortnight I felt perfectly secure, for I was certain there would be no violence on the part of the people. For the first fortnight the fear of any violence on their part went between me and my rest, but from thenceforth I felt perfectly certain that there would be no violence (hear, hear.) I therefore don't complain. I had as pleasant a set of companions in jail as ever was. We had the happiness and blessing of the sweet company of their ladies, and we enjoyed the intercourse of men of great talent and powers, and of facetious communication. No men were living more socially (hear, hear, and loud cheer.)—I now defy Vinegar Smith to deny that they had us three months unjustly in jail. It is now admitted that they had us there without a shadow of foundation. Who did it? The Irish government, for Judge Crampton had some mother wit about him, and he took care to address the Attorney-General, and said if the Attorney-General consented, the court would suspend the sentence, and they would not go to jail to be turned out of it again if the judgment was reversed (hear, hear.) I charge the Attorney-General and the government for not consenting to it. He took his chance—his malignity was to be satisfied, and he sent us to jail. I charge him and the government with that crime—it was a most palpable want of proper purpose on their part not to comply with that proposition. How did they know the judgment would not be reversed? Why, it has been reversed (hear.) But, oh, mark the spite of the man! He insisted upon having us punished upon the chance of the judgment being reversed, never once taking the converse of the proposition into consideration, or reflecting that the judgment might be reversed. During the whole of the trial he was in constant communication with Sir Edward Sugden. I do know whether that poor silly shin of beef, Lord— (laughter)—I always forget his name—Lord De Grey I believe he was called (laughter,) had much to do in the proceedings, but at all events he is responsible, as they were instituted under his government. When the jury was packed, Mr. Moore got up and proposed a remedy for the scandalous grievance under which we were suffering. He said, "this error can be amended; let us consent to put upon the jury list the names which have been abstracted. The Attorney-General's consent would, under such an arrangement, be legal, and we have then some chance of a fair jury." Thereupon the Attorney-General, courteous and amiable little man that he is, got up and told Mr. Moore that he did not know law. It well became him indeed to speak in such strain to Mr. Moore, one of the most eminent men in any profession! Judge Burton interrupted the little gentleman, and told him that the proposal of Mr. Moore could be legally complied with; "you can," said he, "re-store, all those names by consent," but the precious Attorney-General was not to be moved by any interpretation of the law, and uttered not a word when Judge Burton assured him that the thing might be legally done. I mean hereafter to propose that a Committee be appointed, of which I myself will be one, whose business, if it should appear expedient that such a course should be adopted, it will be to go through the principal towns of England in order to explain the merits of our case, and to show them the injury that was inflicted upon us with a view to redress if possible. Here is manifest injustice—an unjust and illegal imprisonment is admitted on all hands to have taken place. What redress are we to have for this injury and insult. Englishmen, I have often been told that the people of England were favourable to us—whatever the aristocracy might be—I will try you now. Either you will join me as one man and insist upon this impeachment, or I will come home and say to my countrymen, "don't mind John Bull—look for your parliament yourselves" (hear, hear.) I will go through England from town to town—from county to county. I will assemble meetings and give them the gratification of seeing a live lion who was caged for three months. But are the ministry to escape? Sir James Graham [groans] had had the unparalleled impudence, in the absence of two members of the House of Commons—myself and my son—to call us convicted conspirators. He had it all his own way, with his packed jury and one-sided judge; and when an unjust verdict is returned, he had the impudence to call us convicted conspirators. (A voice—He is a liar.) Why, you appear to be as uncivil as Graham himself (laughter.) I do not call him by that name, but I call him a foul mouthed letter opener (cheers and laughter.) But I am coming now to the declaration which Sheil got out of Sir Robert Peel. Peel had such unrivalled powers of face, and such total disregard for truth, (at least the newspapers attribute the excess of impudence to him,) to state in the House of Commons that we had a fair trial. (A voice—He is a liar.) Why, to be sure he is. There is the British minister for you! The first country in the world! Why, is there a man in all creation, having the slightest regard for truth, who would dare to say that we have had a fair trial? A packed jury!—a one-sided judge!—the refusal of every thing to the traversers! and the total exclusion of Catholics from the jury box!—and then a fair trial, forsooth: sweet Sir Robert! But perhaps he told the truth—perhaps he thinks it a fair trial for Irishmen! A mockery, a snare, and a delusion, but a very fair trial for Irishmen! I will have no faith in England if the English people do not join us in hurling Peel from his office, and sending him adrift with the finger of scorn pointing to him, as the monster liar of parliament (loud cheers and laughter.) I want to consider the propriety of holding the Clontarf meeting—I want to consider the details of the plan for the formation of the Preservative Society—I want to devote myself to the making up of the impeachment—all these things I want to do, and I am sure I may safely reckon on the ardent support and co-operation of the Irish people. By adopting such a course as we are now pursuing we achieved Catholic Emancipation; and when I see around me such men as the Hutchisons, the O'Briens, the Mocklers, and the O'Neills rallying to the standard of Repeal, I can have no question of our success. Oh! what a day we will have around the statue of King William! This is a day full of hope and endearing anticipation. It is time that we should look forward to have Ireland free: Hurra for old Ireland and the Repeal of the Union [tremendous applause, waving of hats and handkerchiefs.] Mr. O'Connell proposed the admission as a member of Mr. P. Loughray, of Thomas-street.—Freeman's Journal.—(TO BE CONTINUED.)

REASONS FOR RENOUNCING PROTESTANTISM.

The following is an extract of a further communication from a recent Convert to Catholicism to his Father in Dublin, in continuation of the Extract which appeared in the Herald of the 9th ultimo.

"I think it incumbent on me to put you in possession of a few more of the reasons which induced me to become a convert to Catholicism. In the first place it is a notorious fact that conversions to Catholicism are taking place to a great extent in England, and that Puseyism, which is Popery without the Pope, (as it is defined by the present Pope) is spreading so rapidly among both the Clergy and Laity, that the Bishops and Dignitaries of the Established Church are in a most dreadful state of alarm and apprehension for the permanency and welfare of that Establishment. Sever the connexion between Church and State, and in 10 years hence there will scarce be a Clergyman of the Established Church in England. Most of them see that the Catholic Church is the true Church of Christ, but the loaves and fishes are only to be found with the Establishment. That surely cannot be the Church of the meek and lowly Jesus and his poor fishermen, which depends for its stability on an adulterous connexion with the State, and whose valuable and lucrative benefices and prelaties are but provisionary sinecures for the younger brothers, cousins, and tutors of the Aristocracy. Look to Geneva, the birth place of that blasphemous Arch-Heretic, Calvin, whose impious principles led him to accuse our Lord of the sin of despair when he exclaimed on the cross "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me," and whose presumptuous notions respecting predestination and the uselessness of good works led me into the cold regions of scepticism. Yes, look at Geneva, the cradle of Calvinistic reformation, or rather deformation, and you will find there Infidel Socinianism rampant and predominant to that extent, that Socrates and Plato are more frequently eulogized by the mouths of Geneva gownsmen, than our Lord Jesus Christ; such are the fruits of the mis-called reformation. Had I not exercised to its fullest extent the glorious privilege of Luther, that apostle of lust, drunkenness and impiety, viz. the right of private judgment, I should never have been an Infidel,—and I was, I am sorry to say, a confirmed one, until I became a Convert to the Catholic Church. While a Protestant I could not believe in the Scriptures, because I had received them on the authority of what I believed to be an idolatrous and lying Church. Such being the case, how could I believe in the truths of the Gospel? I heard Protestants say, "we believe in the Trinity in Unity." I asked them on what authority they believed the Trinity in Unity? They answered, upon Scriptural grounds. I asked them to prove it from Scripture; they could not: there is not a single passage in the Bible which expressly declares that there are three persons in one God, and that it is absolutely necessary to salvation, to believe the Trinity in Unity. There is a passage in John's 2nd Epistle, viz. "there are three that bear record in Heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, and these three are one;" that is, as will be gathered from the following verse, one as to the testimony they bear respecting our Lord's mission as the Christ, not one God. St. John was writing against the Arch-Heretic Cerinthus, who denied the divinity of Christ. This passage however is rejected by the Protestant Bishop Marsh and the great Erasmus, and the whole epistle was not received into the Church as canonical until three hundred and ninety-seven years after Christ, and then by a fallible Council (as Protestants say) of an idolatrous Church, composed of Bishops who venerated Saints, reliques, and images, and held the doctrines of Purgatory and the real presence. Now it is evident that Protestants cannot find the Triune God in the Bible, therefore, they must believe that dogma on some other authority, viz. the tradition of the Church: but it is contrary to Protestant principles to believe in tradition, therefore they are inconsistent. Now the very right, Protestants exercise, in rejecting certain books of Scripture as spurious, the Apocrypha for instance, which was declared canonical by the same Council as declared the canonicity of the Apocalypse or book of Revelations, 2nd Epistle of John, and some of Peter, Epistles to the Hebrews, Epistles of James and Jude, namely the Council of Carthage, which sat in the latter part of the 4th Century after Christ, when, according to Protestant Church Historians, the Church had fallen into abominable idolatry and superstition, that same right of private judgment I exercised in rejecting the whole Scriptures. In fact I have told Protestants, you profess to believe nothing, but what is contained in the Bible, then why do you believe in the Trinity in Unity which you cannot find expressly declared in Scripture, and disbelieve the real presence or transubstantiation, which is so plainly laid down, that you cannot but see it unless you are wilfully blind. What inconsistency! you receive the Scriptures on the authority of the Catholic Church, and you will not receive her doctrines—how do you know whether she has given you the true Scriptures or not?—At the first general Council, that of Nice, A. D. 325, there were upwards of thirty Gospels examined, all laying claims to divine inspiration, four only were selected by a fallible Council composed of men who are said to have fallen into error. How do you know that those fallible men have made an infallible selection? Perhaps they were deceived, and we have not the true Gospels. How pretty! ‘Oh,’ you say, the Scriptures bear testimony to their own inspiration. What if I show you numerous apparent contradictions and incongruities, what will you say then? The Holy Ghost is not a God of contradiction. The fact is, the Scriptures are divinely inspired, and this belief can only be received on the authority of the Romish Church. If, then, you receive the Scriptures which Rome had preserved entire and uncorrupted for fifteen hundred years, but which your Reformers, according to some of your ablest Protestant Divines, viz. Lowth, Mills, &c. have most shamefully corrupted, interpolated and mutilated, why are you not consistent and receive every article of faith held by those men who declared in Council the canonicity of the Scriptures? St. Justin Martyr, Polycarp, Irenæus, Tertullian, Epiphanius, Origen, St. Cyprian, Cyril Gregory, Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, Athanasius, Chrysostom and a host of other pious Fathers, Martyrs, and learned Doctors, from the first century after Christ, held the doctrines of the Catholic Church, as they are now, which can be proved from their writings,—and yet you will not believe the doctrines, although you receive your Scriptures on their authority. You say, you believe the Trinity in Unity although you do not understand it, nor you can prove it from Scripture, but you deny transubstantiation, because you do not understand it, but it can be proved clearly enough from Scripture. You are not even consistent with your own principles. To be consistent, you should reject the Trinity in Unity, because you cannot prove it from Scripture, and believe in the real presence which can be proved from Scripture; but surely if you receive the Trinity in Unity on the authority of Rome, you run no great risk in receiving transubstantiation on the same authority. You receive the Trinity in Unity because it is incomprehensible, and you reject transubstantiation because it is incomprehensible; the difference, I should think, between incomprehensibles is incomprehensible.

“Now, with reference to the dogma of the invocation of Saints, Catholics do not pay to them the adoration which is due to God himself, they pay to the Saints a relative honor which does not terminate in them but reaches to Jesus Christ, on whose account alone, they, as his faithful followers are venerated. The representative or minister of one temporal Sovereign at the Court of another, is treated with every deference and respect, not on account of his own individual merits merely, but because of the Sovereign whom he represents. It is true Catholics ask the prayers of Saints in their behalf, but they cannot, therefore, be fairly held to derogate from the honor of Christ as Intercessor; otherwise St. Paul is not without blame, seeing that he entreated the intercession of his Corinthian Converts in his behalf. No Protestant will be hardy enough to deny that the blessed Virgin Mary and the Apostles are now in Heaven, and our Lord says, in St. Luke’s Gospel, that “there is more joy in Heaven over one sinner that repenteth, than over ninety and nine persons who need no repentance.” Here then is presumptive proof that the Saints and Angels are aware of what is going on here below, otherwise how is this joy to be accounted for?

“Protestants assert that belief in Purgatory amount to an admission of the insufficiency of Christ’s atonement on the cross. this they are mistaken, the temporal sufferings of the faithful in Purgatory are but means whereby application is made of all-atonement merits of Christ to the souls of the faithful in Purgatory. This is a dogma which has been distinctly declared by our Lord and St. Paul, and unanimously held by the Church since the Apostolic age; many proofs in favor of it can be cited from Scripture, but not within the small compass of this letter. Prayers for the dead is an article of the Church which has lately been allowed by the Protestant Court of Arches, in the case of a female of the Isle of Wight who was prosecuted in that Court by the Vicar of the parish) to be perfectly consistent with the practice of the primitive Church and beneficial too. Now, if after the soul leaves the body it goes either to Heaven or Hell, according to Protestant belief, the prayers offered for the dead are in the former case unnecessary, and in the latter useless, but the Court of Arches has decided that such prayers are useful and beneficial, the natural conclusion therefore is, that the souls of the dead are in a place where they can be benefited by the suffrages of the faithful on earth.

“Catholics are not so superstitious as to believe there is any efficacy in the reliques of the Saints, but they believe that God has wrought miracles by means of them as instruments for the advancement of his glory, and the extension of his Church. God wrought miracles by Aaron’s rod, and no Protestant, I am sure, believes there was any divine or supernatural efficacy in the rod. A young man accidentally interred in the same grave with the Prophet Elisha, on touching the bones of the Prophet, who had been buried there a year before, came suddenly to life. Yet no Protestant will assert there was any divine efficacy in the bones of the Prophet. Garments and aprons taken from the body of Saint Paul, healed diseases, and some pious and orthodox Christians, who were afflicted with distempers, were actually placed in the way of St. Peter, that as the Apostle passed by, his shadow might overshadow some of them. Will Protestants call this superstition? It was not the garment of St. Paul, or the shadow of St. Peter which benefited them, but their belief that God would condescend to make use of the most insignificant means, whereby to work miracles in attestation of the Mission of his son, and for the establishment of his Church.

“With respect to the doctrine of the Real Presence, Protestants reject it principally, because they hold it to be irrational; this was the very objection started by the Jews to that saying of our Lord, “Unless ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you,” the Jews thought this saying not only irrational, but monstrous. The Jews were the Protestants of those days. The Jews could not believe that the Almighty God, whom, as the Psalmist says; the Heaven of Heavens cannot contain, could submit to be so far shorn of his attributes of power and majesty as to appear under the veil of suffering humanity. The Jews of the present day (Protestants) are equally at a loss to account for his real presence under the sacramental veils. While I was an infidel I looked upon both dogmas as equally absurd, and equally well supported by Scripture, and I always said if I could once be brought to believe the incarnation, I could find no difficulty in believing in the Real Presence also, for in point of principle they are essentially the same; but all these dogmas I have much better reason for believing on the authority of a Church, which has preserved the Holy Scriptures for upwards of fifteen hundred years uncorrupted, than I have for discarding, upon the authority of a body of men, virtually apostates, who have, according to the testimony of some of the ablest Protestant divines, most shamefully interpolated, mutilated and mistranslated them. Dr. Mills, a most learned Protestant divine, asserts that there are upwards of thirty thousand errors in the authorized version of the Scriptures; am I not, therefore, justified in regarding the Protestant version of the Bible as the word of man rather than of God? That Church cannot teach truth, which has recourse to the corruption of Holy Writ, to establish falsehood. The translations of Tyndal and Coverdale, which were said to be made under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, were emphatically denounced by King James the First, as shamefully corrupt. Some of the early Protestants have expressed their indignation in no measured language at the base means the Reformers resorted to, to justify their apostacy, namely, the falsification of God’s word. Jeremy Taylor, who was Protestant Bishop of Down and Connor, a most learned and exemplary member of the Church of England, has in unqualified terms spoken of the Church of Rome as the Church of Christ, and has entered into proofs in support of his declaration worthy of a Catholic. Doctors Hammond, Thorndyke, Soame, Cave, as well as Glorious Martin himself, have borne ample testimony in favor of the claims of the Church of Rome to be considered the Catholic Church. On the authority of such men, if I had no other grounds, I would surely be justified in turning over to the Catholic Church. What is the state of Protestantism in Germany and France, Sweden and Norway at the present day, do you think? To what results has the spirit of free enquiry led? Most of the German Protestant divines are either Rationalists or Materialists; at any rate they all agree in denying the divinity and miracles of Christ. In France three or four years ago, I believe in 1840, at a general Council, or Synod of the ministers of the Calvinistic persuasion, the article of the divinity of Christ was discussed as a point still open to question. Oh! were Luther and Calvin again to revisit this earth and contemplate the awful consequences of their apostacy, and their doctrine of the right of private judgment, how they would regret, if they were not utterly destitute of conscience, the rash step they took in leaving the bosom of the Catholic Church. In Geneva, where Calvin publicly burned Servetus, for denying the Divinity of Christ, there is scarcely a Calvinistic Clergyman, who now holds that article. These are awful and astounding facts, but they are, nevertheless, the necessary consequences of the exercise of the right of private judgment."

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

Since our last issue we have the gratification to state, that the joy of the present holy season has been greatly augmented for our brethren in the faith in Calcutta, by the following happy events, namely, the baptism of two adult English Protestants, of one English Protestant youth, aged about fourteen, of another younger boy, born of Pagan parents, and of an East Indian young woman, a Protestant. Besides these auspicious occurrences, we have to add, that a European Lady, a Protestant, has requested that she and her children should be instructed in the Catholic faith and prepared for conditional Baptism, and a like application has been made by an intelligent Mohammedan woman, who has been often sent to England by respectable families of Calcutta, in charge of children, and by a young man, a Hindoo of high caste, from Betteah.

Mrs. Blackney, the widow lady of the late W. Blackney, Esq. Deputy Lieutenant of the County Carlow, and formerly M.P. for the same county, has sent to His Grace the Archbishop a neat suit of vestments for the Bengal Mission. The lining is of black silk, so arranged as to render the vestments fit to be used, not only on the joyous feasts of the Church, but also in Masses for the Dead. This very useful present is rendered additionally valuable, by the circumstance of the vestments having been wholly made by the excellent Lady above mentioned and her pious and accomplished daughter, Miss Blackney. We trust that the example thus given by Irish Catholic Ladies of such high rank will not be lost on those of Bengal. In almost every parish in Ireland, there exists an association of pious Ladies who devote their leisure hours to the making up of vestments and ornaments for the service of the Church. In France the same edifying system is followed under the active patronage of the Queen. We understand that a splendid suit of vestments made with her own hands by her Majesty has been presented by her to the College of Maynooth, through the present Duke of Leinster.

CHUNAR.

We beg to draw the attention of our readers to the following letters and the Circular referred to, received from Captain Willard. The object is so well worthy of the aid of every one charitably disposed, that we feel not the least hesitation to recommend it to the assistance of those who are both willing and able to make the latter days of the worn-out soldier, comfortable and happy.

To the Editor of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

DEAR SIR,—The accompanying papers received by the Rev. Fr. Marcellinus from Chunar, have been delivered by him to me for the purpose of being transmitted to you, with the view of their being published in the Bengal Catholic Herald. His Reverence further requests me to beg your co-operation in support of the measure contemplated, and to mention the names of the gentlemen whom he appoints to receive subscriptions at the undermentioned stations: viz.

Calcutta. His Grace the Archbishop.

I am, Dear Sir,

Your obedient servant,

T. A. WILLARD.

*To the Rev. Father Marcellinus, Apostolic Missionary, Ghazee-pore.
Chunar, 9th November, 1844.*

REVEREND SIR,—It is with great pleasure I have it in my power to inform you that a reply has been received by Lieut. Col. Lloyd, to your petition for Government aid in the erection of a suitable Chapel here; and we are given to understand, that the Right Honourable the Governor General in Council had so far countenanced the design, as to call for information on the means at our disposal for the undertaking, with a plan of the building, and an estimate of its cost.

You will, therefore, I think, agree with us, that immediate steps should be taken to enable us to furnish the required information to the Officer Commanding here; and also that we should put forth every endeavour to meet, as largely as we possible can, the contemplated, though yet undecided grant from the Government, which there is reason to believe, will be apportioned by His Lordship in Council, to our necessities; and the earnestness felt on the subject, as evinced in the sacrifice we are disposed to make towards its furtherance.

The Catholic Community at this Station, are, as you know, all of the humbler order; all invalided soldiers; and none of any higher rank than Serjeant; yet all will come forward with something, and if our Catholic comrades, who are still effective, (and all of whom have a prospect of being one day benefited by that for which their charity is now sought) will each devote some trifle to our assistance, (and all, or nearly all will, I doubt not) the accumulated mites will be found to amount to a sum, amply sufficient to gain from the gallant soldier, and liberal-minded statesman, now at the head of the Government, a helping hand. To that end, it will be necessary to make our wants known to the Catholic public through the medium of the Catholic Herald, the Editor of which will, I am sure, kindly do that favour for us.

Appended is a Copy of the Circular which we purpose forwarding to every station, (European) should our intentions, as now submitted, meet with your concurrence, of which, I beg you will apprize us as early as possible, in order that no time may be lost in applying ourselves to the work before us; as, if we had the subscription once fairly set on foot, and were in a condition to calculate its probable proceeds, we could then give our attention to the plan and estimate, and it is most desirable that the information required by Government, should be furnished with the least possible delay. I am, &c. &c.

G. LACY, Serjeant, President Chapel Committee.

CIRCULAR.

To the Military and others of the Catholic Faith, Presidency Division.

The European Invalid Soldiers at Chunar, professing the Catholic Religion, desirous of procuring a more suitable Building for the celebration of Divine Worship than the very diminutive one hitherto in use, and having assurance that the Government will give them assistance in their design, on their producing funds to such an amount as shall evince an earnestness of purpose deserving of support, do now most urgently, entreat the aid and co-operation of their comrades and friends at every station, in this most desirable end. Catholics are numerous in Chunar; very many have large families; it is the last resting place in this world of the majority of old soldiers of the Honourable Company's Army. All of that army may regard the possibility of its being their eventual residence, if not their latest one; whilst there is an absolute certainty, that to very many it will be so: and for these reasons, as well as others more exalted, it is hoped that every Catholic of the Company's Army will be induced to advance some trifle towards the erection of a temple, which, in the unsearchable ways of Divine Providence, may be the one, in which his latest and most ardent devotions may be offered up. The Catholic Soldiers of Her Majesty's Service, and Catholics in general, are appealed to by the community of faith and worship and hopes, such we all profess, to render us such assistance as their means will admit of; and for which, however limited in amount, we shall ever feel most grateful.

DINAPORE.

We have often had brought to our notice the want of priests, especially among the Soldiers who, moving from station to station, are deprived of the consolations of religion which are so particularly needed by them. We have heard of repeated representations and solicitations being made similar to the one we publish to-day to the address of the Rev. Mr. Moreth, at Dinapore: and how often have such representations proved of no avail from want of but a very limited amount barely for the support of a priest? The government may do much, if it choose; but unfortunately, when the wants (and those we speak of are of paramount importance, being spiritual) of the poor are in question, nothing but a bare notice, if not total indifference, is all that may be expected.

To the Rev. Isidorus Moreth, Dinapore.

Dinapore, 24th November, 1844.

REVD. SIR,—We, the undersigned, as well as the whole of the Roman Catholic Soldiers of Her Majesty's 62nd Regiment, most humbly request you will kindly submit this letter to your Bishop, trusting His Lordship may be pleased to permit you to accompany the Regiment to Umballa, as there is no Minister of the Roman Catholic Faith at that station, the good understanding which has existed between you and your Congregation, since your arrival amongst them, induces us, at their request, as well as our own wish, that you would use your influence with His Lordship to grant us this most desirable boon, and we therefore subscribe ourselves, with the most profound respect, your ever faithful children in God.

Selections.

A CHAPTER OF DEATH.

"The murdered Duc de Berri's chief concern, during the last hours of his life, seemed to be how he could bespeak mercy for his assassin. To the king, who visited him on his bed of death, he thus expressed himself: "Grâce pour la vie de l'homme, et que je meure tranquille, cela adoucira mes derniers momens! Mon oncle, je vous demande la grâce de la vie pour l'homme!" "Let the man's life be spared, that I may die in peace; it will sooth my last moments! Uncle, I implore you to spare that man's life."

Madame de Stael, who had contracted the evil habit of swallowing opium, indulged it to great excess during her last illness. At intervals of mental consciousness she exclaimed—"Mon père m'attend sur l'autre bord!" "My father awaits me on the other shore!" A short time before she expired she said, "Je crois savoir ce que c'est que le passage de la vie à la mort, et je suis que la bonté de Dieu nous l'adoucit. Nos idées se troublent et la souffrance n'est pas très vive." "I think I now know the nature of our passage from life to death, and I feel assured that the goodness of God alleviates its pang. Our ideas become confused, and our sufferings not very acute."

The famous surgeon Dupuytren, who, during his life, had lent a seeming countenance to the prevailing scepticism and infidelity of the times, upon his death-bed, testified in these words to the great truths of religion. "Quoiqu'en puissent dire les indévots, je veux mourir dans le sein d'une religion que je n'ai pas toujours pratiquée, mais à laquelle j'ai toujours cru." Whatever freethinkers may say, I am resolved to die in the communion of a faith which I have not always lived up to, but in which I have always placed my confidence."

Lord Byron's dying words are reported to have been—"Poor Greece! poor town! my poor servants... Why was I not aware of this sooner? ... My hour is come; I do not care for death, but why did I not go home before I came here?" At another moment he said, "There are things which make the world dear to me, for the rest I am content to die." He spoke also of Greece, saying: "I have given her my time, my means, my health, and now I give her my life; what could I do more?" At length, saying, "I shall now go to sleep," he fell into that slumber from which he never awakened.

The last moments of Sir Walter Scott are thus described by his son-in-law: "Lockhart," he said, "I may have but a minute to speak to you: my dear, be a good man: be virtuous, be religious, be a good man. Nothing else will give you any comfort when you come to lie here." He paused, and I said, shall I send for Sophia and Anne? "No," said he, don't disturb them, poor souls! I know they were up all night, God bless them all!"

Madame Roland, who fell a victim to that very revolutionary frenzy of which her own writings and advocacy had fanned the flame, inclined herself, on the scaffold, towards the statue of liberty, and exclaimed, "Oh! liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name!"

The reconciliation effected by that modern Machiavel Talleyrand, on his death-bed, with the Catholic Church, partook of the wariness which had distinguished every action of his life. Protocol after protocol had been exchanged with ecclesiastical authority, before terms of adjustment could be finally arranged; so that the ex-episcopal diplomat's revived spirit of religion seemed less like the ordinary terror of death-bed repentance, than a calm predetermination to go out of the world respectably enough to entitle himself to Christian burial. His last moments were characteristic of the man. The attendants were reciting by the bed-side the prayers for the dying, which he appeared to senseless to understand; but upon invocation being made of Saints Charles and Mourice, the patron name-sakes of the expiring man, he opened his eyes, a smile of complacency gleamed across his countenance, indicative, as it were, of consciousness and acknowledgment, and he quietly breathed his last.

David Hume died in a quiescent state of confirmed atheism,—of all degrees of spiritual blindness the most fearful.

The infidel Mirabeau compared himself, on his death-bed, to Achilles. "Soutiens cette tête, c'est la plus forte de France." "Hold up my head, it is the soundest one in France," he observed to one of his attendants. To a friend that visited him, he exclaimed, "Mon ami, je mourrai aujourd'hui. Il ne reste plus qu'à s'envelopper de parfums. Vous m'avez promis de m'épargner des souffrances inutiles." "My friend I shall die to-day. Nothing now remains but to wrap ourselves in perfumes. You promised to spare me all needless suffering." He then clamoured repeatedly for opium, and died under its influence.

Of David, the French historical painter, who, during the frenzy of the French revolution, officiated as master of the ceremonies in the revival and arrangement of the Pagan pomp organized to supplant Christianity,—the last words were, in allusion to his own picture of the Thermopylae, a sketch of which had been placed before him,—"Il n'y a que moi qui pouvais concevoir la tête de Léonidas!"

"I alone could have imagined the head of Leonidas!"

So strongly impressed were habits of business, combined with a certain happy quaintness of humour, on the mind of the late eminent Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, that upon his physicians taking leave of him, a short time previously to his dissolution, he said to them "Gentlemen, you are discharged," the words in ordinary use, addressed by a judge to the jury, upon releasing the latter from their official duties.

Irving, the celebrated Scotch preacher, died reciting the Psalms in Hebrew, George IV. seems to have experienced, and closely analyzed, as it were, the very nature of the death pang. For it is recorded of his last moments, that, being rather suddenly seized with some violent spasm, he exclaimed, "Oh, this is death!" and immediately expired.

"How do you find yourself?" said his attendants to the dying Schiller. "Calmer every moment," was the poet's reply.

By way of juxtaposition, and contrast with many a foregoing instance, we may not inappropriately recall to mind the closing scenes of some of our illustrious canonized saints, and other distinguished members of the Catholic Church.

OXFORD.—MORE CONVERTS TO THE CHURCH OF ROME.—Within a short time three members of this university have left the establishment and embraced the Roman Catholic religion; George Tickell, Esq., B.A., of University College; and recently one of Lord Stowell's lawfellows of University College; the Rev. Mr. Barton, and a gentleman, a student of Christ Church whose name has not yet transpired.—Oxford Chronicle.

O'CONNELL IN THE CONCILIATION HALL.

Mr. D. O'Connell, jun., acknowledged the receipt of various remittances, amongst which were the following:—Magheracooling and Drumkeerin, county Leitric, per Rev. James Owens, C. C., 8*l.*, which, with 13*l.* heretofore sent by the Rev. P. Gillespie, C. C., makes 21*l.* this year from that locality. A great number of the present contributors are ladies, and the Repealers of the district decline taking any drawback. [Vote of thanks returned to the rev. gentleman and the Repealers of the union, and in particular for their generous conduct with reference to the drawback.] Tourine, per Messrs. Walsh, Repeal Wardens, 12*l.*, including 10*l.* the annual subscription of Sir Richard Musgrave, Bart. Lis-towel 1*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*, per Rev. Thomas L. M'Donnell, R. C. C.

Mr. John O'Connell, who was received with loud applause, acknowledged the receipt of various remittances, amongst which were 1*l.*, the third subscription since the Clontarf proclamation of W. J. Mayler, Esq., and 5*l.* 16*s.* from Woodstock, per F. Comyn, Esq., ex-J. P. Also from Castlequin, Catherciveen, county Kerry, per Kean Mahony, Esq., ex-J. P., 6*l.*, being 2*l.* from Doctor Barry, 2*l.* from himself, and 1*l.* each from their respective ladies, with, he says, "a request that they may be admitted members of the Repeal Association as the most effectual mode they can adopt to exhibit their burning indignation at the atrocious insult offered to their country in the persons of its glorious Liberator and his fellow-martyrs. I pity the artless Irishman who dares to call himself liberal, and will not at this moment come forward to aid in the grand constitutional struggle for his country's liberty. A Home Secretary, pronounced by universal assent to be the most unprincipled political renegade that this, aye, or perhaps any other country has produced, and at the same time the vindictive personal enemy of your reverend parent—the prostration of the judges of the Irish Queen's Bench by their brethren of England, coupled with the untenable presumption on which the majority of the latter gave their decision, and the almost providential character of the reversal itself of the Irish judgment—in fact every thing, from first to last, exhibits a picture of our envenomed foes, at the same time both revolting and humiliating, and calculated more than any other occurrence of modern times to give a deadly stab to the moral power of England throughout the civilized world, as it has already inflicted an outrage on the feelings of Irishmen too deep, too intense, to be ever eradicated until their country becomes what God and nature intended her to be—

"——— Great, glorious, and free,
First flower of the earth and first gem of the sea."

Mr. John O'Connell then proceeded to address the assembly in brief terms.—He said he could not think of trespassing at that hour upon their attention, with any lengthened remarks: but even though he were to endeavour to express his thoughts in language as emphatic and elaborate as he could command, he could not find words to express the deep feeling of his soul; not a feeling of mere personal delight at being liberated from a pleasant imprisonment, but a feeling emanating almost to rapture at the triumph which Ireland had achieved; a triumph which, he ventured to predict, was only the harbinger of a yet more glorious victory, the restoration to Ireland of her domestic parliament (cheers). As to the confinement they endured, he fully agreed with his father in regarding it as an agreeable imprisonment. They had good accommodation within doors, plenty of exercise outside, and excellent fare. He begged to thank his friend Mr. Butler as he was on this subject, for some excellent Kilkenny venison. As one of the representatives of Kilkenny he was greatly gratified to observe the presence of his friend Mr. Butler in that hall to-day. Many good things had come from that place, and nothing better than Mr. Butler. Allusion had been made to the conduct of the Attorney-General in including him. [Mr. J. O'Connell] in the indictment. All he would say was, that he was deeply grateful to the Attorney-General for giving him the highest honour to which a young man could aspire, or indeed any man, the honour of suffering in the cause of his country. He did more, for he gave him [Mr. O'C.] the greatest pleasure which a son could enjoy, the pleasure of sharing in, and mitigating, as far as in him lay, the sufferings of a beloved parent. He also derived great gratification from being permitted to share the captivity of the fearless, devoted, and true-hearted men who were in prison with him. He told the people of Ireland to cherish those men in their heart of hearts. He knew them well, and purer spirits, or more devoted patriots never existed than the men who were incarcerated with him in the Richmond bridewell. They were all out now, and out to work ten times harder than before (cheers.) Though their mouths were closed, their pens were not idle when in prison; but they should now increase their former exertions ten-fold—Providence had interfered most graciously in their behalf, and had smote the oppressor in the hour of his exultation, and it behoved them in consequence to exert themselves with redoubled energy in the cause of their country (hear, and cheers.) He congratulated the people of Ireland, but it is not them he would congratulate, but the people of England, upon what had been done in the House of Lords (hear, hear.) He would tell them from that place that they ought to write in their books and cherish in their heart of hearts the name of Denman, Cottenham, and Campbell (hear hear.) With regard to this country those bright men, those admirable men, Denman, Cottenham, and Campbell, had, in the opinion of many, saved the connection between the two countries; but they had done still more for England for they had served the British constitution. England herself, therefore, should write their names on the brightest page of England's history, for they have saved Ireland to the British connection, and the constitution to the empire. He said before that he was nearly drawn into a speech, his feelings being pent up for three months, and almost bursting within him. But other business had to be disposed of. He would sit down, thanking them for their kind reception of him, and assuring them that to the last moment of his life he would do every thing that within him lay for poor old Ireland (loud cheering.)

Mr. Steele came forward amidst long-continued acclamation, and spoke as follows :—Men of Ireland, the last time I addressed you in this hall before going into prison my address was a solemn adjuration that you would not lacerate the heart of the father of your country during his imprisonment—that you would not annihilate the hope of Ireland, and play the game of your perfidious enemies by any outbreak of violence (great cheering.) Well, gloriously have you done your duty—the tranquillity of Ireland has been preserved, and that awful tranquillity has struck cold freezing horror into the hearts of your enemies, and has inspired fervid hope into the hearts of your friends in every country in the world when they mark your astounding power of self control under your deadly wrongs and infuriation (vehement applause.) No mortal man since the creation of the world so miraculously organised matter as Watt in his improvements of the steam engine, and I affirm in the face of the world, defying contradiction (except the contradiction of some obtuse and ill-informed block-head,) that never since the creation of the world was spirit—the human soul, so intensely and almost miraculously organised as it has been by the august moral regenerator O'Connell, when, by means of the co-operation with him of the Catholic hierarchy and Catholic clergy of Ireland, he has been able to restrain the torrid impulses of our direfully infuriated desperate millions, while their mighty benefactor was the inmate of a prison, its inmate by an agency that throws infamy eternal on the ministry of England (loud cheering.) I shall not of course say a word on general subjects, I think it right, on a day like this, to leave them to be treated by O'Connell who has created the present new order of things in Ireland. The only thing I say is this, lie, O'Connell, is the actual creator of moral Ireland, and if it be left to his matured sapience to wield that country, of which he is admitted to be the moral creator, in the manner which he deems to be potent for regeneration, the national independence of that country is not only inevitable, but inevitable within a period which will astonish the world by its rapidity (hear hear.) I now (said the Head Pacificator) will hand in five pounds sent me from London by that ward of which I have the honour of being a Repeal Warden, and I move for the admission of the gentlemen whose names are in this letter. [The gentlemen were admitted, and Mr. Steele said in conclusion]—My Lord Mayor, it will be perhaps remembered, that I was the very first person who openly, in the Court of Queen's Bench, denounced the iniquity of the spirit in which the prosecution was conducted against the traversers (hear and loud cheers.) It was while I acted without counsel, and before I had availed myself of the resplendent advocacy of my friend Mr. Henn. It will be remembered that I openly protested against my having the Attorney-General as my prosecutor, and I called upon the court to have me prosecuted by the Solicitor-General. The fact is this, that I did not feel more perfectly when I found myself within the wall of the Richmond prison, that I had not had justice from the Court of Queen's Bench than I felt when I addressed that court, that I was not to expect justice (hear, hear.) From the moment when Smith, the Attorney-General, was permitted unrebuked by the Chief Justice, or any of the other judges, to try to poison the minds of the grand jury by his deadly night-shade speech before the bills of indictment were found by them, I gave up the matter as hopeless : I saw that as far as that court of justice (as it is called) was concerned, our destiny was sealed (hear, hear.) Pennefather, the Chief Justice, had the insolence to interrupt me while I was acting as my own counsel, and I replied to him. "My lord, I hope I will have the same magnificent justice from you that I had from your illustrious brother, Baron Pennefather, when I was tried before him, and without counsel defended myself when I was prosecuted in Limerick." Now, although I said to old Judge Jefferies Pennefather that I hope to have justice from him and his court, I expressed that hope with an emphasis and intonation of voice which very clearly proved to all those who heard me that I was not such a fool as to cherish any delusive hope of the kind (great cheering and laughter.) I shall now give a fact for the materials of the impeachment, and sit down. When the question was mooted relating to the legal responsibility of newspaper proprietors, Judge Crampton put this question to the Solicitor-General in my hearing—I was sitting under the bench (hear, hear.)—"Mr. Solicitor, suppose some one were to go to the Stamp Office, and without my sanction and authority to give in, and write my name, as the proprietor of a newspaper, and that same newspaper were to be prosecuted—what then?" "O! my lord," replied the Solicitor-General, "in that case you would have your remedy against the person so wrong doing." To this Crampton rejoined, "Yes, Mr. Solicitor, after I had been fined and imprisoned!" I was sitting near my learned friend, Mr. Fitzgibbon, and I instantly wrote down the words, and handed them to him with a note, stating that this was the very principle contended for by the traversers—namely, that they should not be sentenced to any punishment until after the decision of the law lords on the writ of error (hear, and cheers.) Thus, my Lord Mayor, Crampton by an escapade, in his individual character as one of four Judges, when he put a supposition involving matter personal to himself, sarcastically, in reply to the Solicitor-General, repudiated that doctrine of Rhadamanthus, the judge of hell, which he was afterwards pleased in his justice and benignity to adopt and act upon, when divesting himself of his fractional individuality, he, as an integral part of the court on earth of Judge Rhadamanthus, gave his sanction to the punishment of O'Connell and the O'Connellites, before their cause had been tried by the constituted tribunal of appeal. (Mr. Steel concluded amidst long continued applause.)

Mr. W. S. O'Brien then handed in the following subscriptions :—From Fethard and Killusty, per Very Rev. Archdeacon Laffan, 10*l.*, the September gale, making 63*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* from that locality since the incarceration. Kendal Westmoreland 1*l*. 3*s*., per L. O'Connell, Esq. Moyearkey, per Patrick Fogarty, Esq., 1*l*., being the first weekly remittance from that parish, which has within the present year sent up 40*l*. Arrangements have been made to send up a like weekly remittance until January, 1845. Smith O'Brien ward, London, 3*l*., per Mr. P. Curran.—Aghadoc and Killowen, 2*l*. 10*s*., viz., Aghadoc, 1*l*. 15*s*. and Killowen, 15*s*., per John Drummond, Esq., who acquaints us that the feeling in favour of Repeal is deepening and widening in the north. Bangor, North Wales, 4*l*. 17*s*., per the Rev. Edward Mulcahy, M. A., brother to the respected Alderman Mulcahy, of Limerick. The Rev. gentleman having paid 1*l*., his renewed subscription, was enrolled a member. Adare, 42*l*., per Rev. T. S. O'Grady, P. P. Skibbereen, per William Brickly, Esq., R. W. 5*l*., third monthly remittance. St. Mary's Clonmel, monthly subscription, 11*l*., per Rev. John Walsh, who congratulates us on the triumph of justice, and says that all business is suspended—every one occupied in devising the best means to celebrate the triumph without giving the least annoyance to those who differ in opinion from them.—“The number of our Protestant friends,” says the Rev. writer, “is daily on the increase. Whilst I write, the splendid range of mountains that look down from the north on our beautiful town are all, as far as the eye can reach, blazing with bon-fires; the houses are tastefully decorated with green boughs, the bands playing, and all presenting a spectacle the most beautiful and sublime.” Mr. O'Brien having handed in these remittances, proceeded to say—And now, gentlemen, I am not quite sure whether, upon so interesting an occasion as the present, I am justified in occupying any portion of your time, but I confess that I am anxious to gratify my own feelings by offering my congratulations to the gentlemen who have been liberated from the prison in which they were so unjustly confined (hear, hear.) I am anxious to congratulate them for having sustained a difficult position with a daring boldness—for not having yielded up one inch to the enemy—for having hurled defiance at the oppressors of their country (hear, hear)—for this then, as one individual, I tender to them my personal gratitude (hear, hear.) Am I, then, at liberty to tender to them your gratitude too? (loud cries of “you are,” and tremendous applause.) I congratulate them upon having been instrumental in procuring for this country and for you an effectual vindication of the trial by jury (hear, hear.) There is but one circumstance, I admit, which in any degree alloys the satisfaction which I feel, and that is to think that this victory was not achieved in Ireland (hear, hear.) I have been in the habit in this Hall, and I felt bound, in order to prove the necessity of relying on Ireland for Irish justice, to denounce the manner in which the English government—the English law—had operated towards this country. I therefore feel myself more bound to acknowledge on this occasion that we owe Englishmen the deliverance of these captives (hear, hear, and loud cheers.) True it is that it was but an accident that gave them their liberation. The judges of England were called upon for their opinion. Mr. O'Connell has stated to you, with that luminous exposition which he is so able to command, the technical details of their judgment. For my own part I am satisfied with this general fact—that the English judges declared that the charges brought against Mr. O'Connell were not capable of sustaining an indictment for a criminal offence; and although we know that the very charges so invalidated and pronounced incapable of sustaining a criminal offence were those on which the Irish judges relied in directing the jury and awarding the punishment, the English judges refused to apply the remedy (hear.)—However, Lord Denman turned the scale. Three law Lords in England, men noble by character as well as by station—dignified by true nobility of mind—vindicated justice—vindicated the constitution from the technicalities of law—and to them we owe the deliverance of the prisoners (cheers.) I do confess it is a matter of deep regret to me that this was not effected by an Irish jury (hear, hear.) What would have been the sensation of a Protestant jury in being able to tell their Catholic fellow-countrymen that they might rely on the equity of their countrymen, without reference to the distinctions of party or creed? But unhappily the worst effect of our provincialism has been evinced on this occasion. It has corrupted the minds, the generous inclinations of the jury; those discords, which it has been the policy through centuries of the English government to engender in the minds of the Irish, made the jury forgetful of the rights of Irishmen in the case of their fellow-countrymen, not remembering that in another day the precedent which they established might be converted against themselves (hear, hear.) It is to me a matter of regret, speaking as an Irishman, to find that the judicial bench has been impeached in character. I did hope that there would have been judges on the bench in Ireland who would not have to go to school to England to learn the first principles of equity and justice (hear, hear.) Gentlemen, for my own part I am content to leave to the public opinion of both countries, to the opinion of this association, the question which has been raised by Mr. O'Connell whether or not the impeachment should be prosecuted? Upon that question I offer no opinion except this, that the parties deserve it [cheers.] Whether it be desirable to prosecute it or not is entirely a question of expediency; but let us advert to one saving circumstance, which is this, that if O'Connell and his fellow-prisoners were sent to jail for three months, it was distinctly the act of the English government and not of the judges. I heard myself Judge Crampton intimate to the Attorney-General when the application was made to suspend the execution of sentence until judgment was had upon the writ of error, that the bench would agree to such an arrangement if the crown consented—that consent was refused on the part of the crown. The Attorney-General, I have no doubt, was a willing instrument [hear, hear.] but I say the policy of that award of punishment before crime was established—that sin rests on the English government [hear, hear.] And now, gentlemen, I agree with Mr. John O'Connell that there are no parties so much to be congratulated upon the present occasion as the people of England, for much as we desire to sustain the connection between the two countries, I frankly tell you I could not have answered for the feelings of the people of Ireland if they had seen their leaders spending their winter in jail upon the unproved charge brought against them if the lords had affirmed the conviction. Instead of a peaceable triumph such as we had on Saturday, and the gratifying scene of to-day, the people of Ireland would have been brooding over their wrongs, and with a foreign war pending, it is difficult to say what might have been the result [cheers.] But this I am sure, that the connection between the two countries would not have been strengthened [renewed applause.] Now we have the happiness of being able to discuss these international questions without so much of unkindly feeling as would have then prevailed. We are now in the position of treating with respect to this question on friendly terms, and there is one thing I hope the public mind in England will have been led to think as the result of this trial, which is, that the Repeal of the Union is perfectly inevitable (cheers.) I trust that the ministers of England will now feel that, sooner or later, they must make up their minds to treat with this country on the subject, and that Repeal is inevitable (cheers.) When I say "inevitable," I say it with the full consciousness that there is one thing that could retard it, and that is misuse of your triumph (hear, hear.) There is no man, even the humblest amongst you, who is not now convinced that this country has obtained a great advantage from the observance of that policy of peaceful perseverance which has been so often enforced by your great leader (hear, hear.) I think I know my countrymen well enough to believe that there will be in their minds that which upon such occasions as this is one of the characteristics of true bravery. In the hour of triumph, gentleness and moderation become a people as much as the dauntless defiance shown by you to your adversaries throughout your late difficulties gives to the Irish nation undying honour (hear, hear, and cheers.) But above all things I would implore you, repeating the sentiment for the thousandth time, to apply yourselves to that attempt which you have been making, and to a great extent successfully, of conciliating your fellow-countrymen. I repeat it now in your hour of triumph, as I told you in the hour of danger and dismay, that the Repeal can only be carried by the union of Irishmen (cheers.) My Lord Mayor, I do believe that the Protestant as well as the Catholic will learn in the appeals that are made to them by us that this is a cause in which every man who belongs to this country ought to struggle for the attainment of a national legislature, with a view to promote the happiness, the prosperity, and the glory of his beloved fatherland (loud cheers.)

Mr. M. J. Barry, barrister, next came forward amid loud cheering and said,—My Lord Mayor and gentlemen, I trust that I have not earned for myself so unreasonable a character in this association as to lead any one present to suppose that I mean to trespass any time upon the meeting. I could not think of doing so on an occasion like this. I rise only to hand in a sum of money, and shall accompany it with the fewest possible observations. It is the contribution of the parish of Passage, in the county of Cork, and though small, being only 187, yet, considering the poverty of the place, it is a very creditable sum to the contributors. I was in Passage, 170 miles from this, late on Friday evening, when the news of our glorious triumph arrived there, and I at once resolved to hasten to Dublin. Having been amongst those who accompanied our great leader to his prison, I was determined to have the deep gratification of being present, if not at his release, at least at his first triumphal entry into this temple of Irish nationality (cheers.) I accordingly hurried hither, and on leaving I was entrusted with the sum I now hand in, and I think I can promise an equal sum in a week or two from the parish of Shanbally (hear, hear.) In addition to this money I was likewise, my lord, entrusted with the performance of a duty which I would feel delighted to fulfil to-day, but the pressure of important matter precludes me from doing so. That duty is the presentation of an address from the inhabitants of the united parishes of Passage and Shanbally to our great leader on his triumphant release from captivity. I had the high honour of being selected by the committee of this association to second the address of the body presented to him on his imprisonment, and it is indeed a source of pride and gratification to me to have now entrusted to me one of the first addresses congratulating him on his restoration to the van of the great struggle for Ireland's nationality. That address I will have the happiness to present to him formally on the first occasion when it shall be his convenience to receive it, and beyond expressing my delight at the great victory now achieved, I feel that it would be quite out of place for me to trespass further on your attention.

Mr. Barrett, one of the imprisoned "conspirators," was then called upon by the meeting. He rose and said he obeyed the call made upon him by his countrymen, at the same time that he should promise that he could only speak there by courtesy, not having at present the honour of being a member of the association. But if they conceded that courtesy to him, he would not withhold an observation he felt inclined to make—that he considered the demonstration of that day a glorious consummation of the monster meetings (cheers.) He and his brother martyrs felt truly gratified at having been deemed worthy to suffer for the cause of Ireland (cheers.) He felt with them also the glory and the grandeur of their privileges in having been a martyr with, and sharing the captivity of the leader and regenerator of his country (cheers.) He participated in all that had fallen from him with respect to the happiness of enjoying the society of these patriot martyrs—the social communication—the intellectual intercourse—the "flow of soul," that marked each day and hour of the captivity (hear, hear, and cheers.) But he could not but recollect the opinion dinned into their ears from the first to the last. Every man of the anti-national party gloated with triumph—they were never done telling them that the majesty of the law had been vindicated. Was not the law vindicated? From the judges who tried to the Tory law-officers who prosecuted, and from these to their press, there never was but one cry, "The law shall be vindicated." It had been vindicated, and it had proved who were the guilty conspirators (cheers.) It proved that those were the conspirators who created the false and perjured indictment (cheers.)—who, by means of a fraudulently constituted jury, procured a factious and fraudulent judgment, and who, by the opinion of men learned in the law, as well as by the voice of the public, were unctuously pronounced as guilty of that perjury and that fraud (cheers.) Yes, the vile principle had recoiled on its agents; and while those whom it was intended to degrade and condemn had been elevated—aye, triumphantly elevated—those agents had been proved guilty by that very law which they had sought to pervert to the vilest purposes (cheers.) Thus the law was vindicated—but was justice satisfied? (no, no!) No, it could not be as long as such men held political or judicial trust—as long as a system were suffered to continue which gave the option of making penalty anticipate conviction—of incarcerating before a trial could be had (cheers.) O'Connell was imprisoned, and yet proved to be innocent of either a moral or legal offence (continued cheers.) Although the government came down with its scowls and its threats—although the Attorney-General, with vinegar aspect, fought and blustered—although the Chief Justice in as broken gibberish as ever a Chief Justice used, laid down a law of his own creation (groan,)—although his lordship poured out the phials of his prejudice in support of the frantic prosecutor (laughter,) and although all were aided by the stealthy caution of the hypocritical Crampton (laughter,) and the slippery slime of a drawing Solicitor-General (continued laughter,) they failed to prove moral criminality (cheers.) There was such an absence of crime, and such an absence of proof of crime that even the judge who passed the sentence admitted that that sentence was not for the commission of crime, but was merely grounded on legal technicality. The final appeal determined both; and how then stood the cause? Why, the Liberator and his six compatriots had been imprisoned by a law which was, as it were, read backwards from the text, like the Hebrew language, beginning at the end (cheers and laughter.) That was their case, and he would ask, was justice satisfied? (no, no!) Was justice satisfied so long as such men were continued in power? (no, no!) Oh, they had a glorious cause before them—that cause was a just one, and should succeed, and the people of the whole world were interested in the success of their peaceful movement (loud cheers.) The speaker next referred to the fact, that the Protestant as well as the Catholic had an interest in the Repeal—a measure which, by the union of Irishmen, would, with the blessing of God, be carried.

Dr. Gray, having been loudly called upon, rose and was received with loud cheers. He said,—My Lord Mayor, not being a member of this association, I came here to-day rather in my capacity as a member of the press; and I should have been proud to occupy a place in the box assigned to that body, but that your committee honoured me with an invitation to a seat amongst themselves as one who has had the privilege of suffering some little trouble for Ireland—(cheers.) I feel, therefore, my Lord, that in thus obeying the call of this assembly—in coming forward to say a few words—I have to claim your indulgence (hear.) I claim also the indulgence of the gentlemen who attend on the part of government that they may not tell I spoke here (laughter.) I have to claim, too, the indulgence of the Attorney-General, if he should happen to hear that I have been so fool-hardy as to attempt a speech, and beg that he may not drop his vinegar upon me again (cheers and laughter.) I have to claim a greater indulgence still—that of this meeting—for interrupting their triumphal enjoyment. I would gladly have left them to hear the melodious and familiar accents of him, who sits by my side, and allow the instruction which fell from his lips, unmixed and alone, to fall into their thoughts, and ripen in their understandings (loud cheers.) Yet I feel, my lord, I could not disobey the call (cheers.) I will tell you one fact: there is a great difference of opinion between some of the "Conspirators." My friend Mr. Steele said we had no redress. Have we not redress here; and here, and here (pointing to three gentlemen who had just joined the association?) Have we not ample redress in the glorious meeting of to-day? (loud cheering.) Yes, we have redress, and not redress only, but revenge—and that revenge is sweet, for it is revenge that brings good to all and mischief to none. I would remark that we ought not to mistake the source of our triumph. If we rejoice in having redress, let us not mistake the means by which it was brought about (hear, hear.) It was not brought about by the justice of England—it was brought about by you, and you, and you who rallied round the imprisoned, and thundered in the ears of our oppressors that if necessary you were one and all ready to take their place (great cheering.) It was brought about by the unanimity, the determination, the energy and the resolves of the people of Ireland (cheers.) The House of Commons refused even to give an inquiry—that is what we got from English justice! (oh, oh, and cheers.) The House of Lords, to be sure, have set aside the iniquitous verdict, and the more than iniquitous judgment. But remember the doomed city of old, when it was asked were there fifty righteous men whose virtue might save it from destruction, they were found not; forty were asked for, thirty were asked for, twenty were asked for; ten, five; but five honest men could not be found, and Sodom was laid in ashes (cheers.) We went to England, and asked for the fifty—we asked for twenty, for ten, for five, and five honest could not be found—three men only were found honest in the House of Lords (applause.) Even after that judgment had been given by these three honest men—men whom I honour—not that they are Englishmen, but that they are men—men of humanity and of justice (hear, and cheers.) Even after that, what did Peel do?—Peel, the man whom Englishmen look upon as their chief—Peel, whom the House of Commons admits to be its master—Peel, who has the House of Lords at his beck?—he came down to the house, and in opposition to the judgment of the three honest men, said that you, Sir [to Mr. O'Connell] had had a fair trial (hear, hear.) And what did the House of Lords do? As a body they stood up, and as a body they said—"not content"—not content to have justice done until one of their body—a man high in the ministry—stood up, and for very shame, begged they would not endanger the fabric of the British constitution, and they sat down with dark and murky countenances, muttering their discontent (loud cheers.) We seek, then, the reasons why we stand liberated here to-day, we will find that we are not indebted for our position to English justice, for it was chance that gave us three men, honest enough to declare that a fraudulent and packed jury was not the jury to try Irishmen (tremendous cheering, which lasted for several minutes.)

Mr. Duffy was then loudly called for, and the mention of his name was the signal for renewed cheers. Mr. Duffy had, however, left the meeting some time previously, it not being expected that any of the gentlemen who were not members would have been called upon to speak.

The Liberator handed in several subscriptions, which appear in our weekly return.

Mr. G. Scott, amidst great applause, said he had the honour to hand in 20*l.* 3*s.*, liberation money, from Edinburgh (cheers.) This sum included a subscription of five pounds from Mr. Farquarson, of Finzean, a gentleman of ancient family and large property in Aberdeenshire (cheers,) 1*l.* from Mr. James Fraser Gordon, and also the renewed subscription of his (Mr. Scott's) father, who was an English barrister (hear, hear,) his mother's and his own of 1*l.* each (cheers.) There had, of course, been no time previous to his departure for the Repealers of Edinburgh to hold a meeting to give any adequate expression to their feelings. It would be out of place for him to trespass on the time of the association on such an occasion, and he should merely say that he had hastened to Dublin to bear the hearty congratulations of the Repealers of Scotland to the meeting on the triumphant victory that had been achieved, and to exclaim for them on that glorious occasion—"Hurrah for O'Connell and Repeal" (long-continued cheering.)

Dr. Nagle handed in 1*l.*, the second subscription of James Bruton, Dunboyne; 1*l.* 11*s.* from Cloghan, North Liberty, Cork, per Mr. John Lynch, making 5*l.* 11*s.* from that poor locality for this year. He proposed Thomas Callaghan as member. He then said that as he, with their distinguished countryman, William Smith O'Brien, had proposed that the Liberator's chair should be kept unoccupied until his restoration to them from prison, he could not avoid expressing the thrilling delight he felt that the period of that absence had been so short. He was totally incapable of giving expression to the gratification he enjoyed at seeing their Liberator again occupying his chair after having obtained the most glorious of victories.—He had also to congratulate his noble countrymen on the exemplary manner in which they invariably conducted themselves during the imprisonment of their illustrious leader (cheers.) Never was more noble conduct witnessed—never did the people of Ireland demean themselves in a manner more deserving of the admiration of every one who had a heart capable of appreciating what was generous, exemplary, and patriotic (cheers.) Would to Heaven their rulers were capable of appreciating such moral worth, as they were sensible of the value of Irish valour (hear, hear.) Would to God that they were competent to entertain such ennobling sentiments as once warmed the bosom of that immortal hero over whom chance and treachery at length gave them an entire and lasting advantage. When that great man, on his way to Russia, saw sailing before him after crossing the Niemen that glorious army, which nothing but the all-subduing hand of the Almighty could defeat, he called to his aide a favourite aide-de-camp, and thus bespoke him, "Well, Saint Cyr, never had monarch such an army?"—never had Queen such subjects (cheers.)—"the French are a noble people"—so were they, the glorious people of Ireland (cheers.)—"they deserved liberty"—so did they (hear.)—"and liberty they shall have, Saint Cyr"—so should they, with the blessing of God their own indomitable determination to win, and a tranquil, calm, and determined perseverance in their present peaceable, moral, and resolute struggle for legislative independence (cheers.)

Mr. Brannagan, of Dungannon, then rose and said he had to request some little indulgence from the assembly whilst he endeavoured in a few words to depict the very remarkable manner in which the men of the north received the news of the present glorious and triumphant victory over tyranny and injustice (hear.) He was quite convinced that there were many men who felt honestly and sincerely indignant at the injustice perpetrated in regard of the Liberator and his compatriots who were not yet prepared to join in the struggle for Repeal (hear.) But he (Mr. B.) would tell the meeting, without the slightest hesitation, that there is amongst those men a disposition to investigate the question, and he knew too well the justice and worth of the Repeal cause to doubt the result (cheers.) He wished to re-echo the sentiment so eloquently and nobly expressed by Dr. Gray, "that in this assembly, in the enthusiasm of the spectacle which he saw around him there to-day—in the array of intelligence, rank, and station, met to welcome the martyrs from their prison, there was ample and sufficient recompense for all the injustice suffered for the last three months (cheers.) There was an enthusiasm in the hall—there was an enthusiasm without the hall that gave promise for the future destinies of their country; the accession of such men as he saw there before him was also fraught with hope that they would have restored the blessings and prosperity which marked the period from '82 to 1800 (loud cheers.) Mr. Brannagan then handed in 3*l.* 15*s.*, observing that that sum made the present fortnightly remittance from the town of Dungannon, and wished it to be understood that previous remittances had ranged as high as 50*l.*

The announcement of the remittance being fortnightly, was received with loud cheers.

A gentleman, whose name we did not catch, handed in 1*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* from the College ward.

Mr. O'Brien gave notice that upon that day week, he would move the appointment of the Honorable Mr. Hutchinson, and Mr. P. S. Butler, M.P., on the parliamentary and general committees.

The Liberator said he wished to give notice of his motion in force. His notice was, that the next day of meeting, he would move, first, the appointment of a committee to consider if it be necessary to hold the meeting at Clontarf; secondly, a committee to consider the best plan for the establishment of the Preservative Society; and thirdly, a committee to consider the materials for applying to parliament for the impeachment.

Town Councillor Roilly rose amid cheers to hand in from Messrs. Brennan, Ledwidge, and Moyles, 3 pounds, their second subscription this year. From Kilbeggan and Raheer, per Mr. J. Clarke, 2*l.* Edenderry, per Mr. Myles Keon, 1*l.* 10*s.* From Collumkill, per Mr. Nathaniel O'Reilly, 1*l.* 17*s.* Four Courts' ward, per Messrs Smyth and Crawley, 13*l.* 3*s.*, Mr. Crawley to be member. Cranford, per Rev. J. O'Brien, P. P., who is to be a member, 10*l.* Mullagh, per Mr. T. Lynch, 6*l.* 7*s.* Sandryford, per Mr. Thomas Collins, 1*l.* 2*s.* 1*d.* Mr. P. Daniel, 1*l.*, second subscription. Palmerstown, per Mr. Owens, 9*l.* 6*s.* From Killeshandra, Maynooth, Mountmelick, and several other places various sums which will appear in the weekly lists. From Laurencetown per Mr. Thomas Daly, one pound "victory money" (loud cheers); per Mr. J. Mahony, one pound, being the balance of the collection made by the printers who turned out so respectably in the procession on Saturday (loud cheers); and one pound from John Smyth, the carman, who paid one pound in sorrow at the unjust captivity and now hands in the same sum in joy at the liberation (loud cheers.) There was no phase of Irish politics at which John Smyth had not done his duty, and no change to come will find him absent from his post (cheers). Hurra for O'Connell! (loud cheers.)

Mr. Ryan handed in his weekly remittance from the Custom-house ward. 1*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.*, and moved that Cornelius Ryan be appointed a Repeal Warden. Motion passed.

The Liberator said—I have the honour to announce that the Repeal rent for this week, exclusive of the several large sums which persons from the pressure were unable to hand in, to be five hundred and seventy-five pounds six and sixpence. (Deafening applause.)

The Lord Mayor was then moved from the chair, and Mr. Boylan, of Hilltown-house, called thereto. On the motion of the Liberator, a marked vote of thanks was passed to the Lord Mayor for his dignified and patriotic conduct in the chair.

The association then adjourned to Monday next.—Freeman's Journal.

PORTUGAL.—On the 10th inst. Monseigneur de Pietro, Archbishop de Berito, internuncio, and apostolic legate, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of His Holiness at this court, had his first audience of her Majesty. In his address on this occasion he expresses his hopes that the desires of the Holy See might be realised by finding on each occasion a support still more firm in the piety and well-known zeal of her Majesty, and from the Tagus an example shown to all the world, that by the virtue of a young Queen all the powers of the state shall be brought to tend towards the good of religion. After an expression of the paternal sentiments of benevolence (of His Holiness) for their Majesties and their august family, and of a respect for a Sovereign who gloried in the title of most faithful to the Church, the Queen replied in the following terms to his address:—"I am very sensible of the paternal benevolence with which the Holy Father is animated towards me, my consort, and all my royal family, and I hold it my duty to respond to these sentiments with the expression of the sincere veneration which I profess for His Holiness, and of the religious attachment which binds me to the Holy See. I avail myself at the same time of this opportunity of expressing to you that it is very agreeable to me to receive you in my court as the representative of His Holiness."

FRANCE.—The Univers states that several French and Italian Jesuits have just embarked at Bordeaux for Madagascar, where they intend to form a missionary settlement.

A grand mass was celebrated lately in the church of St. Augustine, at Vienna, in honour of the second son of Mozart, who died recently at Carlsbad. Upwards of 800 performers took part in the service, and the famous Requiem was finely executed. The Archbishop of Vienna officiated, and a great number of persons of celebrity in the arts and literature were present.—Galignani.

Six sisters, who were of the Protestant religion, were solemnly baptised, on the 8th instant, in the church of Ledeberg, in East Flanders.

ROME.—His Eminence Cardinal Silvester Belligli, Bishop of Jesi, born at Anagni in 1781, and raised to the Cardinalate on the 12th July, 1841, having been reserved in pectore in the Consistory of the 14th December previous, died of apoplexy in his episcopal city on the 9th inst.

The new Bishop of Gap gave a dinner to 300 poor persons on the 13th inst.

A STARVED CLERGY!—The Canterbury Chapter, consisting of a dozen canons, enjoys about 15,000*l.* per annum. At Durham, the same apostolic number share about 30,000*l.* a-year. London is nearly the same. Westminster and Windsor come very close to 20,000*l.* a-year each; the Warden and ten Winchester Fellows share about 10,500*l.* for positively doing nothing—not a sermon can be extracted from one of them that we are aware of. The entire income of our cathedrals and collegiate bodies stand in the Parliamentary reports at 284,241*l.*; exclusives of fines, leases, residences and the like, which, as is well known, and was demonstrated in the House of Commons by Lord Montague, would add another 250,000*l.* of annual revenue to the amount by a fair change of leaseholds into freeholds. It is not too much, therefore, to take the gross sum, comprehending within it about sixty sinecure rectories, at 550,000*l.*, representing a capital of about eighteen millions sterling, at the present prices of landed and real property.—Eclectic Review.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 1.]

[VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, JUNE 27.

The Bombay Times states that Mr. R. N. C. Hamilton, who recently succeeded Sir C. M. Wade as Resident at Indore, has attained the highest popularity for his princely style of hospitality, which strongly recalls to mind the days of Mr. Elphinstone at Bombay.

The Delhi Gazette has letters from Sukkur to the 30th of May which are not without interest. A sepoy of the 64th had deliberately shot a comrade while he was asleep near him, and the other sepoys refused to give him up. While Sir Charles Napier was holding his splendid levée at Hyderabad, with eight or ten thousand of the chivalry of Scinde, Capt. Malet, the Resident at Khypore, gave a grand nautch on her Majesty's birthday. His Excellency Ali Morad fired a royal salute at sun-rise and sun-set. He had previously invited all the nobles and chiefs from the country to attend at the Residency in honour of his Royal Mistress, and he made them drink her health in Brandy, contrary to the laws of the Koran.

Sir George Pollock is making preparations for his immediate departure from Lucknow to assume his seat at the Council Board.

The Englishman talks of a Railroad scheme from Bombay to Agra, in which the Governor and Sir Jamsetjee have taken shares. Half a century too early.

The Bombay Times says that a correspondence has recently taken place between the East India Company and Her Majesty's Government; and that the former have represented the inconvenience which has arisen from considering Mysore a Foreign territory; and it is understood her Majesty's Ministers have agreed to consider it as an integral part of British India.

FRIDAY, JUNE 28.

The Auckland, Steamer, arrived from Bombay yesterday, with a portion of the prize-money taken at Hyderabad. By a singular coincidence she has been placed at the disposal of the late Governor-General, and he will be conveyed back towards his native land in a vessel named after the Governor-General, on whom his first public notifications attempted to fix the stigma of extravagance.

The Hurkaru of this morning contains a well-merited tribute to the public conduct and private virtues of the late Mr. C. B. Greenlaw, which we recommend to the special notice of our readers.

A vessel has managed to get fast in Channel Creek where she had no business. Mr. Moxon, one of the most experienced of the Pilots, has been sent to extricate her.

Mr. Longueville Clarke, one of the most eminent barristers of the Supreme Court, who left Calcutta at the beginning of the year for England, has just been cast in an action of libel, brought against him by Mr. Waller, one of the Solicitors of the Court, whom Mr. Clarke charged with breach of trust and other vices, and refused either to explain or to retract the charges. The Judges found a verdict for the plaintiff, and fixed a fine of 500 Rupees on Mr. Clarke.

SATURDAY, JUNE 29.

Yesterday's Semaphore announced the arrival of the Lord Hungerford with Dr. Wallich on board. He will now resume the post he has so long occupied at the Botanic Gardens, where he will be pleased to see the numerous improvements which Mr. Griffith has introduced.

Our Calcutta contemporaries have more than once brought to the notice of the benevolent public, the very destitute condition of the poor prisoners who are confined for debt in the great Jail of Calcutta, chiefly under the sentences of the Court of Requests. No provision is made for them beyond six pice, or three pence a day, which their creditors are obliged to allow them. A Cart goes round some parts of Calcutta to collect the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table; but owing to the contrivance of the butlers, it too frequently returns empty, and the meat it occasionally brings is in a state bordering on putridity. Would it be impossible to provide some legal relief for these poor creatures, similar to that which is made for wealthier defaulters, and to restore them to liberty on their relinquishing all their property?

A Correspondent of the Calcutta Star says, that Government has at length sanctioned the construction of the Bridge of Bali, which will connect the great Benares road with the suburbs of Calcutta, on the opposite side of the river. He states that of the sum of 38,000 Rupees, which the bridge was originally estimated to cost, one half has been contributed by the public. We believe the Bridge will cost in all a little above 50,000 Rupees, the extra sum has been made up by public funds. We have heard that Captain Goodwyn has already made a commencement, and that the structure is likely to be completed at the end of next year.

MONDAY, JULY 1.

A new publication comes into being this day. The Calcutta Magazine, and Daily and Monthly Treasury for July, 1844. We have not had an opportunity of seeing the work, but the Star has paid it the compliment of devoting nearly three columns to a review of it.

The Agra Ukbar has an interesting article on the Sirdar Lena Sing Majeeta, who is destined perhaps one day to play a conspicuous part in the Punjab. He is travelling about with a long retinue through our provinces, treasuring up remarks for some future occasion of importance. He is on his way to Benares, where it was once said he would see the Governor-General; but where he will not see him now. He proposes, according to popular rumour, to proceed as far south as Hyderabad, to visit the shrine of some Punjabee saint. He would do well to visit Calcutta on his way, and examine its wonders.

The Delhi Gazette has a batch of Cabul news, not of any particular importance, more especially at the present time, when it is known that no provocation would induce us to interfere in the politics of that country. Dost Mahomed is said to be consolidating his empire, and the bride of the Sirdar Mahomed Akbar, the daughter of the usurper, Yar Mahomed, has arrived at Candahar. The article concludes with saying "that it is evident that all recent events in Central Asia are fast tending to a complete bouleversement of every arrangement made by us in our attempt to establish British supremacy by force of arms where more peaceable and less expensive measures would have been more successful." We thought the bouleversement complete as soon as we had turned our backs on Afghanistan, and set Dost Mahomed free. Before our army reached the banks of the Indus, there was scarcely a vestige of our arrangements left.

Further papers to the 29th May have been received from Mouleim. The most mysterious affair that has occurred for a long time at that settlement is the escape and destruction of the convicts. More than a hundred of them were proceeding to their destination with a slender escort, when they rose on their guard, and after having overpowered them, fled into the jungle; part of them however did not attempt to escape. The jailor, peons and others came to the aid of the Tulein corps. Seventeen of the convicts have been killed and thirty wounded; and strange to say, though there must evidently have been a severe struggle to account for such slaughter, few of the Government officers were either killed or wounded. This circumstance, combined with the appearance of the wounds, leads to the very strong suspicion that they must have been hacked and butchered in cold blood by the fellows sent after them.

TUESDAY, JULY 2.

The Madras Athenaum states that Bishop Spencer has issued orders to all his Clergy to doff the Geneva Gown,—the emblem of the Reformation—and to preach in future in their surplices—the emblem of Puseyism. This is going farther than some of his Episcopal brethren at home, who endeavoured to compromise the difference between the two schools, by ordaining black for the pulpit in the morning, and white in the after part of the day. Our contemporary alludes to an intention on the part of some of the clergy to take the field against this innovation.

The Singapore Free Press of the 6th of June, has come to land this morning. It mentions several cases of very flagrant piracy recently committed in the Straits, chiefly against the unoffending Cochin Chinese, who come to trade to the island. The Editor states that all our attempts to eradicate piracy have failed. Three of her Majesty's Ships, the Dido, the Harlequin, and the Waterloo, have been together or alternately employed in that service, but the result has been that not a Sampah has been captured though attacked by a squadron powerful enough to take Singapore itself, and one has been seen or chased in the act of robbery; nay, it is to be doubted whether a single robbery has been prevented. The conclusion at which our contemporary arrives is contained in the following advice, "large vessels and slow boats ought not to be employed to catch fast pulling pirates."

WEDNESDAY, JULY 3.

The number of covers despatched by the last Mail from Bombay to Suez was as under:—Letters, 34,284; Papers, 10,792. Total 45,076. The Calcutta Express of the 10th came in with the regular mail of the 9th. The Monsoon has now set in, and it will no longer be prudent to postpone writing to a late day in the hope that the regular mail and the express will arrive at the same time.

The Bombay Times states, that owing to the defective system of Opium inspection now prevalent at that Presidency, its commercial interests are likely to be seriously affected. Within the last six months Opium, which had been passed by one and all of the medical inspectors as of the first rate quality, has on being surveyed on its arrival in China been pronounced "very inferior indeed." The opium is extensively adulterated. Report speaks of 400 chests, which originally cost half a lakh of Rupees, now being, on their way back from China. Lakhs of Rupees are locked up, because merchants decline to invest them in that which may turn out to be trash. Unless, says our contemporary, measures are taken without delay, the money which would have been sent to Malwa will be sent to Bengal and the Bombay market will be abandoned by the Capitalist.

The Agra Ukhbar has it on excellent authority that on the afternoon of Monday the 6th May, the Court of Directors agreed with Government to refuse the papers, which were connected with Lord Ellenborough's recall. If they are refused, the inevitable inference will be that the recall was just. Lord Ellenborough on his arrival in England will of course insist on their being produced, and give us the benefit of his own comments on them.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 2.]

THURSDAY, JULY 4.

The Delhi Gazette mentions, that among the notices received from Peshawur, it was stated that Herat had actually been taken by the King of Persia, on behalf of Prince Jehangeer, the son of the late Shah Kaniran, and that Yar Mahomed had fled from his capital. It is also rumoured that Dost Mahomed has left Cabul and proceeded to Candahar. His son has recently formed a matrimonial alliance with Yar Mahomed. It would be a curious sequel of the course of events in Afghanistan during the last six years, if the Dost and the King of Persia should meet in hostile array in the neighbourhood of Candahar. There is no longer a British minister at the Persian Court to remonstrate against the capture of Herat, and an advance into Afghanistan.

The Englishman states that Major-General Cooper and the officers of the Presidency Division waited on Lord Ellenborough yesterday afternoon to solicit his acceptance of the farewell entertainment which the Military of the Division were anxious to give him. His Lordship is said to have received the Deputation with his usual courtesy, accepted the invitation, and fixed the fourth day after Sir Henry Hardinge's arrival for the ball and supper. On such a subject as this, the Englishman, considering the side he has taken in recent discussions, must be a first-rate authority.

Letters from Peshawur given in the Delhi Gazette state that the Commander, Tej Sing, had received orders to send back all the regular troops to Lahore and to raise a local corps of three thousand men. This speaks well for the good understanding which subsists between Dost Mahomed and Heera Sing.

An attempt has been made to poison Prince Timour, the son of Shah Soojah, at Ferozepore. Arsenic was put into some sherbet which he drank, but he took but little of it; and a native hukeem having been called in, he recovered. Futteh Jung is suspected by the Shahzadas of having employed some one to attempt the crime.

FRIDAY, JULY 5.

Hong-Kong papers of the 1st of May, state that the appearance of the American frigate Brandywine in China has given great umbrage to the Chinese government. The Chinese authorities are above all things anxious to prevent her proceeding to the northward, or Mr. Cushing's attempting to obtain an audience of the Emperor. Every obstacle will be thrown in his way, short of actual resistance.

The Englishman states that it is a dinner, not a ball and supper as originally stated, which will be given to Lord Ellenborough by the Military Service.

The same paper announces the total loss of the Camco, from Liverpool, at Kedgerce, with a valuable cargo of £40,000. Nothing is visible of the wreck beyond the topmasts; and there is no expectation of recovering the cargo. The same paper says that the loss of the vessel is to be attributed to the want of due and the usual precautions. She was riding at single anchor, and had no deep sea line on board when she struck, and the pilot was asleep on the poop. Then why was he not waked by the officer on duty? Pilots need repose like other men after a hard day's work in the sun.

The quantity of Indigo in one concern of some magnitude in Tirhoot, destroyed by the locusts, is estimated at one-third of the whole crop. They squatted down for eight hours, and left the plant totally bare of leaves.

SATURDAY, JULY 6.

Papers have been received from China to the 24th of May. Mr. Davis's four commissions have been published: the first authorises him to bring to a conclusion certain matters which are now under discussion between the Emperor and the British Crown; the second constitutes him Chief Superintendent of the China trade; the third refers to the passing of laws for Hong-Kong; the fourth appoints him Governor of Hong-Kong and its dependencies, and their forts and garrisons. On a reference to the Chinese authorities, it has been ruled that vessels bringing rice to China shall be exempted from Port Charge; but if they should take an export cargo, they will be liable to half the tonnage duties and the duties on the cargo. The Chinese authorities are said to have determined not to admit into the Consular ports, vessels which have been employed in the sale of Opium on the coast. But how they are to identify vessels which have been surreptitiously engaged in this trade, may well puzzle us.

The Bengal Bank has rather unexpectedly declared a dividend at the rate of Eight per cent. for the last six months. The information before the public led to the belief that the banking transactions of the last half year, owing to the abundance of capital, would not have yielded such a return. Without the accounts before us, it is difficult to write on the subject with precision. It is well known that the Bank was so fortunate as to invest a large sum at par in the five per cent. loan, before it closed. Those securities now bear a premium of eight per cent., and the sale of them would of course give a very profitable return, and may have contributed to create so flattering a dividend. As this sum has arisen from a fortunate speculation which cannot be repeated, perhaps it would have been wiser to have added the profits to the reserve fund, to meet the accidents that all institutions are liable to. The influence of this arrangement will be to keep up shares to their present unnatural elevation, and to produce a corresponding fall at the end of the next six months, when the dividend must necessarily be lowered considerably, unless there shall immediately be a greater demand for Bank Capital.

The last accounts from the Punjab mention the death of Jemadar Khoosial Singh, once a favourite of Runjeet Singh.

MONDAY, JULY 8.

The Englishman says he has received farther unsatisfactory accounts respecting the 64th N.I. in Scinde. General Hunter has proceeded to Shikarpore on their account. The grass cutters belonging to the wing of the 7th Cavalry at Shikarpore are said to have been all murdered.

We mentioned on Saturday that the Jemadar Khoosial Sing, who was once a particular favourite of Runjeet Sing, and rose to great wealth and distinction in the Lahore state, had paid the debt of nature. We regret to learn that two of his wives have sacrificed themselves on his funeral pile.

The Calcutta Gazette announces the appointment of "Mr. James Alexander, as Solicitor to the Government of Bengal;" in what Court is not mentioned. The office appears to be a new one.

The Hurkaru in an editorial article this morning has this remark, "It has been said that the only proper way to get a correct idea of how the London world is wagging, is to look at the advertisements of a daily paper." We thought the same remark might be applicable to the Calcutta world, and turned to the advertising sheets of our daily brethren, and we found,—1st, That the Ferry Bridge Company, which started with such magnificent promises, after having been long on its last legs, has at length not a leg to stand on. The Committee appointed to wind up its affairs have instructed Messrs. Tulloh and Co. to sell "that very handy and commodious steamer the Kedge, which has been little used"—the more the pity—"and is admirably adapted for pleasure parties." 2ndly. The magnificent salt works of the late G. A. Prinsep, Esq., at Ballea Ghatta, which have been a source of so much disappointment, are now brought to the hammer. Though they have been commenced some eight or ten years, and have sunk a mint of money, we are told that "the pukka evaporation house has just been completed, at a very great cost, with machinery for precipitating the brine by aerial evaporation, which process renders the produce of the works independent of the vicissitudes of climate." The extensive brine fields, terraces, boiling houses and reservoirs, are said to be capable of producing 20,000 maunds a year. Indeed! then why have they not done so?

Dr. Mouatt, professor of Chemistry and Materia Medica in the Medical College, has lately informed the Native students of the institution that Baboo Dwarkanauth Tagore has promised to afford the necessary expense for any two students who will go to England and receive a University education.

The Ship Candahar from China to Bombay has been wrecked on the Bombay coast, six of the crew have been lost.

The Bombay Times has a very ominous notice on the subject of Cheroots, called at this Presidency by the more aristocratic name of Segars.

The Tobacco crop has failed at Manilla, and the stock of Segars on the island is not more than enough for the smoking of the Natives. No Segars will, therefore, be manufactured for exportation; consequently the price of the weed will rise; and Segars which now sell at 25, will rise to 50, perhaps 100 Rs., and tens of thousands. Cheroots, manufactured in Bengal, will be sent to Singapore and covered over with a Manilla leaf, and come back as "Manilla Segars of the first quality."

TUESDAY, JULY 9.

The case of the Will of Sir William Casement was argued at great length in the Supreme Court yesterday, and it was decided to have been insufficiently executed, on the ground that when it was signed by the Testator only one of the witnesses was present, and though he afterwards acknowledged the signature in the presence of both witnesses, only one of the witnesses signed after the acknowledgment.

A suit has just been brought in the Court of Requests to recover 11 Rupees from Mr. Manuel, the value of a bonnet sold to Mrs. Manuel while she was a spinster. The husband, who marries his wife's debts when he marries her, was condemned to pay the amount.

The Hurkaru has Scinde letters to the 17th June, which state that Sher Mahomed had come down to Shahpoor, a place about twenty-four miles from Khangurh, with 1500 Murrees, Boogties, and Jukraanees. The Ex-Ameer was anxious to attack the British position, but his wild allies shrunk from the contest and the party retired. Sukker and Shikarpore are still healthy.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 10.

From the Colombo Observer received this morning, we learn that the surplus revenue of the island during the past official year was £58,000, of which £21,000 have been devoted to make up the deficiency of preceding years, £11,000 to Supplementary contingent charges, and £26,000 for the execution of public works.

From the same authority, we learn that 28,000 laborers have landed at Manaar, during the first six months of the present year, and that they are still pouring into Ceylon from the opposite Coast. One vessel of 25 tons brought 416 coolies; There were recently 2,000 waiting at Tallennar to cross, and at the same time, the weekly arrivals were at the rate of 500.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JULY 20, 1844.

[VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, JULY 11.

We are happy to find that the Bentinck, even at this season of the year, which is reckoned almost a blank, has not fewer than 48 passengers besides a number of children. Unfortunately they are not all for the long journey, we mean the journey throughout, as some will stop at Ceylon and some in Egypt. Still the compliment of passengers is a fair one for July, and would have been deemed incredible ten years ago. We are sorry however to see how the printer's devils have been allowed to murder the name of the late Consul General for France, in the dominions of the Emperor of China. Le Comte et la Comtesse de Ratti Mouton; turned into 'the "County and Countess of Battle Menton."

From a report of the last meeting of the Agri-Horticultural Society we learn that Sir Lawrence Peel has generously placed at the disposal of the Agri-Horticultural Society, the liberal donation of 400 Rupees a year, to be appropriated as premiums by the Society for any object which may be thought most beneficial and useful.

A draft of an Act has just been read in the Legislative Council, withdrawing the control of the Jail from the Judges of Circuit, the Commissioners of Circuit, the Superintendent of Police, and the Nizamut Adawlut, and vesting it exclusively in the Civil and Session Judge, who will act under such orders as he may receive from the executive Government.

Sir Richmond Shakespear is stated in the Agra Ukhbar to have summoned a full durbar at Gwalior on the 23d June, when he communicated the fact that Lord Ellenborough had been recalled; and assured those present that not the smallest change would ensue in the administration of the Gwalior country; and that if the present tranquility was disturbed, the disturbers would inevitably be sent to Chunar,—which is worse than being sent to Coventry.

FRIDAY, JULY 12.

The Delhi Gazette which reached us yesterday gives the distressing intelligence that the 64th N. I. had again broke out into Mutiny, and refused to receive their pay, because it was not what they expected. They demanded 12 Rs. and will no longer fight for 8 Rs. They pelted Col. Moseley and Genl. Hunter and his Aid-de-camp with clods and brickbats.

The Englishman states that Lord Ellenborough anticipates leaving India in the Tenasserim on the 1st proximo. This will be a capital opportunity for writing to England. Sir John Peter Grant proceeds by this opportunity to Ceylon, and possibly Sir Lawrence Peel.

SATURDAY, JULY 13.

The American Clipper Antelope, Captain Dumaresq, has just arrived with news from China to the 7th of last month. This is one of the shortest passages on record at this season of the year. She brings intelligence of the arrival of the Imperial Commissioner, Keying, from Peking, with full power to negotiate with the American and French plenipotentiaries. They have of course nothing to ask except that they may enjoy the same privileges as the English, which had been already secured to them by Sir Henry Pottinger. It is evident that the Chinese Cabinet is above all things anxious to prevent their sailing up the gulf of Peechelee, and demanding an audience of the Emperor. Surely American and French vanity may be satisfied with less than a visit to Peking which the English, even in the hour of victory, refused to press.

The Hurkaru's Punjabee news contains the following strange intelligence:—"The Rajah Sahib on the 23d assembled a Council of his General Officers, and it was resolved to issue a proclamation to the effect, that the English were watching an opportunity to conquer the territories of the Maha Rajah, to hold them and their households in vile durance as slaves, and to treat them worse than such! The Maha Rajah recommended his men to allow no dissension to part them from each other;—he depended on them for the annihilation of the English;—he called his tutelary deities to witness that he would convey and march his army across the Sutledge for that purpose—he would drive his enemies, valiant and capable as he was, like so many flocks of sheep before him—and complete the achievement by planting his victorious banner in the Port of Calcutta! For this feat he awaited the close of the Dushera vacation." We can scarcely believe this to be true. The whole aim of the Rajah Sahib,—if by this person is meant, Heera Singh, the Regent—has been to avoid a collision with the English Government. There was a time last year when our army was assembled at Gwalior, when he might have made a successful foray across the Sutledge, and plundered perhaps up to the gates of Delhi before troops could be sent to check him. He was strongly incited to do so by the Tara Baee, who seems to have all the spirit of her renowned ancestry, the Gourpureys, in her, but refused; and it seems incredible that he should now talk of wantonly provoking the British lion.

We have Penang papers to the 15th June. The order from hence for the supercession of Mr. Salmond had arrived in the Straits, and seems to have taken all, but the parties interested, by surprise. The Penang Gazette, is on the wrong scent when he says, "The exact reason, however, for such a sudden supercession and deprivation of offices has not yet transpired, but we understand that these functionaries—alluding also to Major Law's deposition—have fallen under the displeasure of Government in consequence of their continuing to hold possession of their landed property in opposition to the Government Orders of late years on the subject."

From what we hear, the Editor's conjecture is very wide of the mark, but if we were to detail the cause,—which after all we suppose every body here knows—we should come within the grasp of the law.

MONDAY, JULY 15.

The Madras Bank has just declared a dividend at the rate of six and a half per Cent. per annum.

There is no farther information from beyond the Indus. An ugly rumour is mentioned in one journal which we shall not diffuse by repeating, because it may be fully contradicted before we go to Press. The Delhi Gazette received on Saturday states that the mutinous 64th arrived at Sukkur on the 26th June. The clearest account of the sedition we have yet seen, is given by our contemporary.

The report regarding the capture of Heerat by the Persians, and the death of Yar Mahomed, is now believed to be premature; but the Hurkaru says he thinks it an unquestionable fact that a Proclamation was put forth by Heera Singh,—chiefly however to keep his own soldiery in good spirits—in which he promised to lead them across the Sutledge and march to Calcutta.

The Englishman of this morning has some important particulars from his correspondent at Aden. The Hindustan reached that port on the 5th of June. She made a long passage of sixteen days from Galle to Aden. After leaving Galle she experienced a strong monsoon; one of her quarter boats was carried away, with an iron davit attached; the sea at the time was running too high to admit of lowering a boat to save her. She was wet and plunged heavily into the head sea. The eldest son of Mr. Woodcock of the Civil service, was killed a few days after leaving Ceylon, by falling down a hatchway 26 feet. The new Governor-General was expected to reach Aden either in the Hindustan or the Berenice; and it was somewhat probable that he would continue his voyage to Calcutta in the Sesostrie, which had been directed by the Resident to be held in readiness for sea, as soon as the approach of the Suez Steamer was signalled; in which case the Bombay Mail and passengers would be taken on by the Euphrates, a brig of war. Both the Hindustan and Berenice were expected there on the 28th or 29th.

Private accounts from Sijiah received by the Englishman state that General Lumley had received a letter from General Galloway, mentioning that an increase both of officers and of Regiments had been sanctioned by the Court, and only waited the confirmation of the Board of Control.

TUESDAY, JULY 16.

Moulmein papers have been received to the 1st July. They are, however, without interest. Intelligence of the recall of Lord Ellenborough had reached the settlement. The only notice worth extracting is the reduction of timber duties from 30 Rupees to 21 Rupees a ton, and return to the old mode of measurement.

The Hindustan gives news from Sukkur to the 27th of June. The refractory 64th Regiment was at station on the 25th. The Hindustan demanded of the officers a list of the ringleaders, names were given. The next day, the 27th, thirty-seven men were seized and sent to the Quarter-Guard, and the Regiment ordered on—Hindoostan.

The sale of the presents made to Lord Ellenborough during his tours in the Western Provinces commenced at Messrs. Hamilton and Co's., Calcutta, yesterday and will be continued to-day. At the last meeting of the Agri-Horticultural Society the expenses attending the erection of the Metcalfe Hall were submitted to the members. It appears that the original estimate for the building was 48,921 Rs. The cost for extra work, including the erection of an iron roof,—which is three times as heavy as it ought to have been,—has been 15,242 Rs., making the total cost of the building 64,163 Rs. Of this sum, 43,000 have been advanced, and 20,911 Rs. are said to be now due; but according to Cocker this is impossible, though all our three daily contemporaries have it so.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 17.

The papers, are so utterly bare of all news this morning that the mail must be at hand. We say so from having often remarked the coincidence of these two events.

The papers state that the Commander-in-chief has laid an embargo on the plan of a Subscription for an Army Testimonial to the late Governor-General.

The only other item of news we can glean is, that the Editor of the Star has for once been unable to give half an hour's attention to his paper. Hence a letter appears from Mirzapore, stating that the deposed Rajah Pareechut had plundered three or four villages of the Jeitpore Raj, and put to death the dependants of the usurper Khet Singh—that is of the individual placed by our Government on the throne of the rebel,—that the Rewa territory was all disorder; that the Raja had excited the Pooar and Chundole chiefs to rebellion by ejecting them from their villages, that men and guns had been sent from Gwalior—and that Col. Sleeman was to have a grand meeting in imitation of the Scinde gathering! The animus of the writer cannot be mistaken.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 4.]

[VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, JULY 18.

An elegant model of a locomotive steam engine with a train of three carriages for passengers and luggage has arrived at Agra, as a present from the Court of Directors to the Rajah of Bhurtpore. The height is about 8 or 10 inches, and the length of the engine about 14. It runs on a model railroad, and is propelled by spirits of wine. The makers are Newman and Sons of London.

The Lahore news writer of the Hurkaru states that Heera Singh, at a Durbar held at Lahore, declared that there was no faith to be found in Christians; that Avitabile, who had amassed wealth in the Punjab, took his leave and went to Europe as soon as the troubles commenced; that Ventura, took leave for the purpose of going home, but had now leagued with the British for the ruin of the Punjab. Soon after this speech the youth called all the French and English together, paid them up, and gave them their discharge.

FRIDAY, JULY 19.

Heera Sing, from some cause which it is difficult to divine, appears to be not only inveterate against the British Government, but in a state of feverish anxiety regarding its designs. Assuredly there has been nothing in our movements during the last three months calculated to rouse his suspicions; yet he has been expediting news writers to all the principal cities in the North West, to obtain the most accurate information of our projects. His scouts will of course pick up and transmit every floating rumour without the smallest inquiry into its truth. We have recently had an opportunity of seeing the mass of falsehoods which the native news writers are in the habit of sending their masters. If however, they should happen by accident to announce that Lord Ellenborough has been recalled, lest he should swallow up the Punjab, their mendacity might for once be returned to good account.—Friend of India.

OVERLAND INTELLIGENCE.

The Bombay Express came in this evening about half past four, bringing intelligence from England to June 7.

The debates regarding Lord Ellenborough's Recall have yielded no information of much consequence. The Duke of Wellington has made a sort of amende, in the form of an explanation. It has been determined not to produce the papers, at all events, till Lord Ellenborough's return.

O'Connell has been sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment, and a fine of £2,000. The other traversers have escaped more easily.

Sir Henry Hardinge has been appointed Provisional Commander-in-Chief.

The Government measure for the introduction of free-grown sugar of other nations, has been carried by a majority of 69.

Lady Hardinge and the two Miss Hardinges were to proceed to India, Overland, in October.

The Emperor of Russia had arrived in England.

Demand for Indigo very limited, Sugar in a declining state.

Mr. Whiteman has come into the Direction.

Sir Henry Hardinge is on board the Hindustan.

Sir T. Fremantle goes to the War Office.

Amount of Bills drawn on Bengal £70,860.—Hurkaru Extra.

SATURDAY, JULY 20.

The Overland Mail of the 7th of June came in yesterday evening, with intelligence that Sir Henry Hardinge had left London for Marseilles with the view of embarking on the Hindustan at Suez. That vessel may, therefore, be expected in three or four days.

In reference to the proposed Testimonial from the Army to Lord Ellenborough, the Hurkaru has this day cited the example of Lord Wellesley's conduct on a similar occasion, which is at once decisive of the illegality of such a proceeding. The Mysore army had determined to present his Lordship with a star and badge of the order of St. Patrick, enriched with jewels taken from the treasury of Tippoo Sultan. In his reply to the proposal, Lord Wellesley declared "that he should have been proud to wear such an emblem of their glory, and of their personal regard; but that, on a careful examination of the subject he had come to the conclusion, that he could not accept of their gift without violating the letter of existing statutes. Although it could never have been contemplated by the British Government to prohibit the acceptance of honorary marks of distinction, yet here it might create a precedent which might hereafter become a source of detriment to the service, which he hoped they would consider a sufficient ground for his declining so flattering a mark of their approbation." Lord Wellesley is a great authority with Lord Ellenborough. Should the army, therefore, even offer the testimonial, the late Governor-General is bound to decline it.

MONDAY, JULY 22.

The Meeting at the Union Bank on Saturday was very pacific. The Shareholders accepted the Report, passed the accounts, and voted a dividend of Seven per cent., thereby strengthening the reserve fund, and augmenting public confidence.

The Calcutta Gazette of Saturday, states that Mr. Sutherland, late Principal of the College at Hooghly, has been appointed Secretary to the Superintendent of Marine, in the room of the late Mr. Greenlaw, a most appropriate appointment, as the man is as well adapted for the place as the place for the man. Letters from Aden state that Captain Haines will be positively appointed Superintendent of Marine. Col. Irvine as yet only officiates at that post; and Col. Benson, therefore, continues at the Medical Board, pending the orders of the Court of Directors.

The latest news from Lahore is, that the Rajah Sahib—by which name Heera Sing, the Major of the Palace, will in future be designated—has dismissed all the European officers in the Sikh service, on the ground that they made themselves acquainted with the designs of the Sikh Cabinet and communicated them to the English. Two officers were excepted from this sweeping measure, Captains Courtland and Baggess; but they refused to continue in the service, and wisely demanded their discharge, as they must always have been objects of suspicion, and every insight which our government might gain into the plans of the Durbar, would be laid to their charge.

TUESDAY, JULY 23.

The papers announce the death at Cawnpore of Major-General Biggs of the Artillery. This casualty promotes Lieut. Colonel Powney, and throws open the valuable appointment of Principal Commissary of Ordnance, and Director-General of the State pyrotechnic exhibitions.

The papers state that Colonel Warren, Town-Major, Captain Durand, Private Secretary, and Capt. Herries, A. D. C. to the Governor-General, proceed down the river at day-light this morning on the Hooghly Steamer, to meet the new Governor-General.

The Hon. P. Hanson, Governor of the Danish settlements in the East, is announced as having arrived at Tranquebar, on his way to Calcutta, by the Hindustan.

The Officers of the Bundelkund Legion have subscribed Three Thousand Rupees to the Ellenborough Testimonial.

The Nawab Mirza Ali Khan, who had been found guilty of murder, has been sentenced to death by the Judges of the Sudder Court at Agra. The sentence was carried into execution at 8 A. M. at Delhi, on the 9th instant. Thousands of persons assembled to witness the execution, most of whom, perhaps out of compassion to a man of such exalted rank, declared the sentence to be unjust. About 4,000 attended his body to the grave.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 24.

The Hindustan Steamer was announced yesterday.

Suez hurried through Egypt. The Hindustan reached Aden on the evening of the 4th July, sailed on the 6th, arrived at Galle early on the 16th, coaled there in 12 hours, left it on the 17th, reached Madras on the 19th, left it on the 20th, and reached Calcutta on the 23d.

The Assam Steamer has reached Allahabad in seventeen days and one hour; the quickest passage on record. She is expected back by the 26th, and will have immediate despatch, as the greatest part of her cargo is already engaged.

The Englishman states that Mr. Hardinge, the son of Sir Henry Hardinge, has been appointed his Private Secretary: and that Major Wood of the 10th Hussars, his nephew, will be the Principal Aid-de-Camp.

From the same paper we learn that the payment of the Ghuzni prize-money has been announced by the present Mail.

Col. Mosty has been removed from the 64th to the 2d European Regiment, and Colonel Caley has been appointed to the 64th, the late commander of which is ordered to remain at Sukkur, pending the arrival of farther instructions.—Friend of India.

SIR HENRY HARDINGE.

The three guns promised by the Gazette was the first announcement we received that the Hindustan had arrived at Kedgee. The report reached us about $\frac{1}{2}$ past 10 yesterday morning. An order was issued for the attendance of the Civil Servants, &c., at Government House at 5 o'clock, to receive the new Governor-General. Some companies, of H. M.'s 10th Regt. and of a Native corps, were drawn up within the Government House compound, round which carriages and vehicles of sorts were very numerous. The assemblage of persons from the river side to the Government House was large and every body appeared excessively gratified on the occasion. The lower verandah of the Treasury was crammed, as usual on any occasion of sight-seeing, with natives: the weight was too much for the structure, and it gave way from end to end: three persons were taken up, as we understood, very seriously injured. The evening closed in without any arrival, and the crowd had pretty well dispersed by $\frac{1}{2}$ past 7. At 25 minutes past 8, the Governor-General arrived; and, proceeded forthwith to the Council Chamber, and took the customary oaths of office. May his administration be beneficial to the country. Sir Henry's first Minute was to continue Mr. Bird Deputy-Governor of Bengal.—Calcutta Star, July 24.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 5.]

[VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, JULY 25.

The Governor-General has appointed his son, Mr. Hardinge, Private Secretary, Major Fitzroy Somerset, Military Secretary and Major Wood, and all the late Governor-General's Aids-de Camp, on his own staff.

Lord Ellenborough has fixed his departure for the 31st of the present, or the 1st of next month.

The post of Bullion keeper at the Mint is vacant, and Government has advertised for candidates to fill it. The salary is 250 Rs. a month, and the securities required are to the extent of two lakhs and a half of Rupees. It is generally understood to be one of the most lucrative appointments in the gift of Government, almost, if not altogether, equal to that of Dewan of the Salt Golahs at Sulkea. The emoluments of an office may always be more accurately ascertained by a reference to the extent of security required, than to the amount of the salary. Of course, no man would ever entangle himself with securities to the tune of two lakhs and a half of Rupees for the mere advantage to be derived from the receipt of the thousandth part of that sum monthly.

Letters from the Cape mention that Sir W. Nott's health has not improved, and that he has been advised to go home from the Cape; this places the rich appointment of Resident at Lucknow at the disposal of Government. Sir Robert and Lady Sale had been five days at the Cape, but her Ladyship's health had suffered much since she left India.

A writer signing himself Amicus Curie in a review of Lord Ellenborough's career, has stated that, "within his knowledge, the whole population of Delhi marched in procession, with banners flying and music playing, to their principal mosque to return thanks to Allah, for the defeat of the Feringees at Cabul." As the fact was new to us and our contemporaries, we looked to the Delhi Gazette for a corroboration or denial of it. He now flatly contradicts it, and states that half the population is Hindoo, and could not have gone to the mosque.

The Bombay Times thus accounts for the delay in the arrival of the June Mail. The Steamer on leaving Aden had the advantage of a nine knot breeze, and the engines were therefore not used. But it soon moderated to a three or four knot breeze, and the vessel continued unconsciously to make her way through the water, at the rate of a snail's gallop, sparing the Company's fuel and prolonging the voyage by more than a day.

FRIDAY, JULY 26.

We gather from a letter which appears in the Star of this day that the Pilot who had charge of the Cameo when she went aground at Kedgerree, and was lost, has been subjected to a Court of Inquiry, and acquitted of all negligence. It appears that at 1 A. M. he secured the ship, and laid himself down to rest. An attempt, it seems, was made to throw the blame on the pilot, on the ground that he did not point out to the commander that a five knot tide was to be expected during the first part of the ebb, and that a vigilant watch would be required, and such means as a harbour lead used, or the hand lead frequently thrown to ascertain that she did not drive into shallower water. But this would not have been to throw the responsibility of the ship on the pilot while at anchor, as well as while under weigh, "which would wear out a Pilot in seven years."

The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette mentions the death, at Ahmedabad, of Major-General Fearon.

The letter of a correspondent published in the Star states that the out-turn of the Indigo this season will probably not exceed 130,000 or 140,000 maunds.

Mr. James Sutherland having been appointed Secretary to the Superintendent of Marine, has received a very flattering address from the Instructors in the English department of the Hooghly College. The Moulavees also presented him an address in Arabic verse, which was first read by the head Moulavee, Akbar Shik, and then orally translated into Oordoo by another of their number. The Pundits presented an address in Sungskrit, written on vellum, and enclosed in a neat and appropriate box of metal. Then followed the students of the Institution with their addresses.

We are happy to learn from the Hurkaru that Mr. George Clerk has been appointed provisional member of Council. The appointment has long been expected.

SATURDAY, JULY 27.

The Assam steamer arrived in Calcutta yesterday, having made the voyage to Allahabad and back again in 27 days including two days' stoppages. The trip of 1,600 miles has therefore occupied 25 days; quite as much time as the vessels of the state have sometimes occupied in the upward trip alone. There is every reason to believe that the exertions of the Indian Steam Navigation Company will be crowned with complete success; that is, that the commercial freight of Calcutta will be conveyed to the marts in the interior, at a low rate and in a very short time, and yield a reasonable return of 7 or 8 per cent. for the capital expended; always supposing it is not most grossly mismanaged and made subservient to individual interests.

Capt. D. L. Richardson, formerly Principal of the Hindoo College, who has been for sometime in England editing a Jersey paper, has, we learn from the Englishman, being appointed to succeed Mr. Sutherland as Principal of the College at Hooghly.

The Hindoo states that a Gold Mohur coinage has been ordered at the Madras Mint. The Eng- Lishman says he understood that after the machinery at the Mint in Calcutta had been brought to such perfection, the chief part of the Madras coinage would be executed here. So did we also understand. We heard that the Mint at Madras was to be chiefly confined to the duty of receiving bullion, we cannot therefore understand the present announcement. Since our Mint machinery has been rendered so perfect, we have also some approach to perfection in the means of conveyance, and a whole steamer load of coin can now be sent with great safety and in less than a week from the banks of the Hooghly to the shores of Madras.

Heera Singh has at length succeeded in discharging all the Europeans who were in his service. Col. Courtland, Dr. Martin, whose real name is Hornsburg, Dr. Hornsburg's brother, Col. Gardner, and also Col. Steinbach, of the last of whom it was said some time ago that the Governor-General had refused him permission to cross the Sutledge, which turned out to be entirely unfounded. Large and numerous drafts have been remitted by the Sikh chiefs and others in the Punjab to the Shroffs in our own provinces, which look like a mistrust of the permanence of peace. Azeezooddeen, the barber, the hukeem, the favorite of Runjeet Singh, is said to be all but blind, and is scarcely able to attend the Durbar.

MONDAY, JULY 29.

Our good friends at Bombay have taken the lead in the establishment of railroads. A Company has been formed for a Railway of more than fifty miles in length from Bombay to the Thull and Bore Ghat roads; the cost is estimated at 35 lakhs of Rupees. We hear that a fifth of the sum has been subscribed, 1500 shares of 500 Rupees each having been taken.

Since the arrival of the Mail, with intelligence that after November next, East India Sugar would have to compete with the sugar of all foreign countries, in which it was raised by free labour, with a protecting duty of only 10s. the hundred weight, all sugar transactions in Calcutta have been at a stand. The only shipments made, consist of previous purchases and contracts.

The subscriptions to the Ellenborough Testimonial at Landour and Mussoorie, amount to 1876 Rupees. The list is headed by Sir John Grey, with a donation of 300 Rupees.

TUESDAY, JUNE 30.

The Star has a letter from Sukkur dated the 8th of July, which says that the station has been shamefully abused, that there is not a station in India at which there is less sickness than at Sukkur, and that the ill savour of its name has arisen entirely from the sickness of the last year, which was not greater than at Delhi or Kurnaul. We must, however, wait the subsidence of the Indus, and the exposure of its deposit of slime to the action of the sun before a fair estimate can be formed of the salubrity of its banks. It is singular that not a word has been said in any letter about the state of the other Regiments, besides the 64th. We have yet to learn whether they have taken their reduced pay without a murmur. This letter states that Shere Mahomed has broken up the force he had collected on the edge of the desert at Olotch, and has gone off, it is said, to Mooltan.

The Report of the Indian Laudable and Mutual Insurance Society was read at the meeting held on the 26th instant. Deducting lapses and withdrawals, 27 additional lives have been insured, making the total number of lives on the 1st instant 500. We looked with some anxiety for this report after having perused a letter in the Star, which asserted that one-half the capital of the Society had been lent to a single House on the Security of Union Bank Shares. It appears that the Correspondent had been altogether misinformed; that the sum invested in Government paper is 6,40,000 Rs.; that the sum lent on the deposit of 111 Union Bank Shares scarcely exceeds a lakh of Rupees, and that it has been divided among five individuals.

THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S LEVEE.—Sir Henry Hardinge held his first levee on Monday morning at Government House. It was numerously attended by gentlemen in the service, and by many out of it, both Europeans and Natives. Mr. Bird stood on the Governor-General's right hand, and introduced to his particular notice some of the most distinguished members of Native society, with a few appropriate remarks. Sir Henry Hardinge received all who were presented with great urbanity, and thus opened his public career in India, under the most favorable impression. Although nothing has transpired as yet to afford a clue to the character of the new administration, yet the contrast between the first week of the present and the preceding reign, has already begun to create a feeling of confidence.

Lord Ellenborough was in the adjoining room, and those who were made acquainted with the fact, proceeded to pay their farewell respects to his Lordship, who took the opportunity of saying a few parting words of kindness to all.

THE MILITARY ENTERTAINMENT TO LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—The entertainment to Lord Ellenborough, by which the officers of the army have endeavoured to evince their sense of his Lordship's invariable kindness to the military branch of the service, was given on Monday evening. Sir Henry Hardinge, as every one expected, declined to be present, and the members of Council, and the Judges of the Supreme Court followed his example. Few, if any, members of the Civil Service were present. It was therefore in the strictest sense of the word a military entertainment to the late Governor-General, and appears to have been conducted with much propriety and moderation. No convivial meeting under such peculiar circumstances could have gone off with less that was obnoxious to the body of whose measures it was so likely to be considered a tacit condemnation.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 6.]

[VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, AUGUST 1.

The Englishman of this morning has published a more correct version of Lord Ellenborough's Speech. We were in hope that it would have contained a correction of that singularly injudicious expression, "Gentlemen the only regret I feel in leaving India, is that of being separated from the Army." It would have been equally complimentary to the army, and far more consonant with the character of a Governor-General to have modified it into "one chief regret I feel, &c." But the corrected speech still retains the word ONLY. Even if such an address was appropriate from the ruler of a hundred millions of people, who was about to bid their country adieu, it can scarcely be called original. It looks too much like Napoleon's farewell to the Imperial Guard at Fountainebleau.

The Bundelkund legion, having volunteered to serve in Scinde for three years, will march towards that province next month, that is, in August. So says the Agra Ukhar, though we should have thought a month or two later in the year would have been more advisable.

The first instance of the transfer of a trust to the Registrar of the supreme Court under Act 17,—1813, has just been sanctioned. A collection was made for the family of the late Martin Blake, who was assassinated at Jeyapore in 1835. It is somewhat singular that Mr. Leith should have alluded to a gentleman so high in the diplomatic service of government, as "a person of the name of Blake who had died in distress." The money was vested in the Collector of Delhi, who having died, Sir Herbert Maddock was appointed his executor, and took out probate. Sir Herbert now applied to be relieved from the trust, with which request the Chief Justice complied.

Captain Shaw, who, as Cornet Shaw, was severely wounded at the battle of Maharajpore, and was rewarded for his gallantry by being appointed an Aide-Camp on Lord Ellenborough's staff, has gone home in the Tenasserim Steamer. The amputation was not very successful, and he has been recommended to try another operation in England.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—Our late Governor-General embarked at Prinsep's Ghaut on the Tenasserim Steamer, at noon on Thursday 1st August, under three salutes,—one fired as he entered the state carriage at Government House, a second as he entered the Fort, and a third as he quitted the shores of India. Sir Henry Hardinge took leave of him at Government House. Mr. Bird, and a number of gentlemen in the civil and military service, accompanied him to the ghaut, to bid him adieu. His Lordship has had little reason to be dissatisfied with the treatment he received since his recall was announced, and he ceased to be any thing but the first private gentleman in India. From all classes of society, and not less from those who conscientiously disapproved of his measures, he has experienced that respect which is due to fallen greatness; from the army he has received all those demonstrations of gratitude which he had so richly earned by his exclusive devotion to its interests; and all those official honours have continued to be paid to him which belonged to his former station in the Government. The public authorities have made no distinction between the individual who laid down office compulsorily, under the frown of the Directors, and his predecessor who voluntarily resigned his post amidst their regrets.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 2.

The Star has letters from Shikarpore to the 13th July. The energy and vigor displayed by General Hunter, in causing the ringleaders of the Mutiny in the 64th to be seized by the Sepoys of that same corps, and conveyed to the Quarter Guard of H. M. 13th, appear to have produced the most salutary effect. There was not the smallest appearance of insubordination, either in that or any other corps. The climate is said to be very agreeable, and there were very few sick in hospitals. The dread of the climate had subsided, and we sincerely hope there may be no fresh outbreak of disease to revive it. Shere Mahomed had not been able to keep his savages together, and had fled no one knew whither.

The Hurkaru has some trans-Indus intelligence, which, had we not now a peaceful administration, would have been more interesting. It is said that the King of Bokhara and the Wuliy of Koolloon have combined together, and are about to come down on the Dost. Who knows but that there may be some movement in the countries beyond the Indus, to bring their hordes down on the plains of India?—to perish like a swarm of locusts when it falls into the sea.

There are letters and papers from Hong-Kong to the 28th May. Trade in the northern provinces is said to have been dull. The trade has stagnated from a report that the French and American squadrons are going to the north to attack the Chinese, and although as they say "fifty piecy English frigates" are expected at the same time to preserve order, the panic is so great, that a number of families have left Chusan.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 3.

Mr. R. Frederick Barlow, the Master Pilot who took the Samarang out to sea, has published a letter in the Hurkaru, giving a singular—unfortunately not a singular—but a remarkable account of the crew with which this vessel was sent to sea. The vessel is of 861 tons burden and unlike so many other ships which are rarely insured, she was not too deep. The Europe crew consisted of nine, of whom the carpenter was seriously ill, the Master's son laid up with sore legs and feet, another boy convalescent, and one seaman, who said he was ill, and intended probably to remain so during the voyage. There were, therefore, the cook, and big boy, and three little boys fit for duty. The Native crew consisted of eight; but then none of the officers could speak a word of their language, or name a single rope; and in this state has the vessel been sent to sea.

The Bentick Steamer which left Calcutta on Monday the 15th, did not reach Madras till the morning of Sunday the 21st, having encountered a very heavy monsoon. She was to remain there 36 hours.

The Hurkaru draws attention to the fact, that it has been ruled by the Prerogative Court in London "that the Wills of Officers, signed in cantonments, are not entitled to the privilege granted to such wills when made on actual military service." Officers should bear this in mind. Unless their wills are executed with all the formalities of the New Will Act, they will be treated as that of Sir W. Casement's was; they will be thrown out, and their property made over to the Registrar to be divided as he thinks best.

The Medical officers of this presidency have resolved to raise a subscription of One Gold Mohur each, in order to provide a testimonial for Dr. J. R. Martin, as an acknowledgment of the great service he has rendered the army in prevailing on the Court of Directors to grant a pension for an intermediate period.

The Englishman alludes to the great activity of the silk trade this year for which it is difficult to account on commercial grounds. The stock at home was large, and the market falling, and the present crop in Bengal is likely to be heavy; yet, the exportation has been 36½ per cent. more than that of the last year, and 35 per cent. more than that of the two preceding years.

We are happy to learn from the Englishman that Mr. Charles Joseph has just completed his map of the several lines of communication between England and India. We hope it will meet with more encouragement than his map of the River from Calcutta to Hoogly met with, which was one of the finest productions of our lithographic press.

The subscription to the Ellenborough Testimonial, according to the Delhi Gazette, amounts to 8,562 Rs.

That Journal, in allusion to the fact that orders have been issued in Soinde to keep 1,500 Camels and provisions for 10,000 men for three months in readiness, says, it leads to a belief that operations will really take place in the Punjab during the ensuing cold season. He is reckoning without his host. The administration which led India to expect an annual campaign is over. Sir Henry Hardinge will not visit the banks of the Sutlege this year, and, unless the Sikhs invade us, there will be no war.

MONDAY, AUGUST 5.

The Star affirms that the testimonial to Lord Ellenborough, as a pure Military affair, is abandoned.

It is thrown open to the public. Any donations from officers will thus come from them as individuals. The Englishman of this morning gives the subscriptions of some of the Civilian in Calcutta, among whom we find the names of the three Secretaries to the Government of India, Mr. F. Currie, Mr. Dorin, and Mr. T. R. Davidson, for 500 Rupees each.

The City Article of the Englishman states, that since the arrival of the last Mail, which has deterred European merchants in a great measure from shipping Sugar, Native holders have manifested a disposition to support prices by shipping on their own account, under advances, but it is not believed that their determination will last long.

We find that we have inadvertently omitted to notice a remarkable Order of Sir Charles Napier, in reference to the recent discomfiture of a small detachment. He requires his officers at outposts to be constantly on horseback. He says, "The European officer, who commands at an outpost, must be eternally on his horse, with a sword in his hand—he should eat, drink, and sleep in his saddle." Some of our contemporaries have been disposed to smile at the order for officers to sleep on horseback. We receive the order as a proof of Sir Charles Napier's classic reading. He has evidently been devoting his leisure moments to Gibbon, who, in allusion to the martial habits of the Scythians, says, "The Scythians of every age have been celebrated as bold and skilful riders; and constant practise has seated them so firmly on horseback, that they were supposed by strangers to perform the ordinary duties of civil life, to eat, to drink, and even to sleep, without dismounting from their steeds."

TUESDAY, AUGUST 6.

The community at Bombay, have determined to testify their esteem for the public character and private virtues of their distinguished citizen, Sir Henry Pottinger, by offering him a public entertainment on his arrival at that Presidency.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 7.

We deeply regret to notice the death of Dewan Ram Komul Sen. We shall give a full account of his labours next week. Meanwhile we extract the following notice from this day's Star.

"We notice with much regret the death of Baboo Ram Komul Sen. He was one of the very few considerably in advance of his countrymen, and his place will not readily be supplied. He was, when in the enjoyment of good health, active and business-like, giving his services to various societies and institutions, and fairly dividing the representation of the native community with some half dozen others, whose names are familiar to the public. He was one of the vice-presidents of the Agricultural Society, and a member of three of its Committees, he was also on the Committee of the Calcutta School-Book Society, and one of the Governors of the Native Hospital; he further belonged to the Committee of Management of the Hindoo College and of the Parental Academic Institution. We repeat that his loss is a serious one, and we trust that many will have the honourable ambition of succeeding him in his good works."—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 7.]

[VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, AUGUST 8.

The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette states, that on the last day of the trial of the Parsees, at which four were found guilty and sentenced to death, every precaution was taken to prevent an outbreak of popular fury. The Chief and Junior Magistrates and Superintendent of Police were present during the whole of the day—with a powerful body of constabulary and sepoy police. A strong force of Police Cavalry was stationed opposite the Court House. The Military authorities were on the alert, Major-General Baumgardt, Commandant, Major Seton, Town-Major, and the Fort Adjutant, with 50 Artillerymen, and 200 men of the 10th Regt. N. I. There seems to have been as many precautions taken at Bombay on this occasion as were taken at Dublin on the day of O'Connell's sentence.

The Assam steamer started again for Allahabad the day before yesterday, on her eighth voyage. She accomplished the previous voyage to and from Allahabad in the short space of twenty-three days. Some of the Government vessels have been longer on the upward trip. It is said that the profit of the vessel has been progressively increasing; that in the fourth trip, she cleared 350 Rupees; in her sixth 5,000 Rupees, or thereabouts, and in her seventh, the last 7,800 Rupees. This is scarcely credible; but it affords good hope to those who have taken an interest in the Inland Steam Navigation Company.

The French War Steamer, the Archimede, Capt. Paris, from Brest, bound to Pondicherry and China, is announced as having arrived at Trincomalee. She has on board the French Embassy to the Celestial Empire; but it is much to be doubted whether the French Envoy will not be constrained to content himself with a more humble reception at Macao. Every account from China shews the increasing repugnance of the Imperial Cabinet to these officious visits.

The Hurkaru remarks on the amusing advertisement recently published in the Government Gazette, for a Bullion-keeper at the Mint, who is to deposit and give security to the extent of Two lakhs and a half of Rupees, and to receive a salary equal to about one per cent. of his security! The advertisement has been withdrawn; so we suppose the place has been filled up. Indeed we knew it would not long go a-begging. In this country, whenever Government refuses any officer entrusted with power an adequate salary, he makes the public, that is, all who have occasion to do business with him, pay it. We are not much mistaken, if the Bullion-keeper's place be not worth as much as the Mint Master's; only their salaries come from different sources.

We have forgotten to notice that the proprietor of the Athenaeum has been a sufferer in a case of libel. We believe the prosecutor was a stable-keeper, of whom his own servant had said something very offensive at the Police, which found its way into the Athenaeum with the report. The Editor made an apology for his sin of ignorance, which was apparently accepted. Eight months after, the plaintiff finds that his character still needs the support of a Court of Law. He brought his action, and got a verdict of 200 Rupees; but we question whether he has much mended the matter in the estimation of the public.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 9.

The Civil Surgeons have addressed a petition to the Court of Directors, soliciting the revision of the order which directs that they shall be liable to a remand to their regimental duty on being absent from their stations for more than six months, either on private affairs or on sick leave. They solicit that their furlough may be regulated by the same principle as the furlough of other staff officers, who, in case of sickness, are allowed two years, to the Cape to recruit their health. Their petition appears highly reasonable, but unfortunately the Englishman, late from England, gives them no reason to hope that it will be granted.

The Star says that Mootee Lall Seal has presented a piece of ground, immediately adjacent to the Medical College, to that Institution. The value of the donation is from 10 to 12,000 Rupees.

The Hurkaru has noticed a case of extortion which is often practised both in town and country, and which a vigorous police ought to check, and might check effectually. The Houses of business are in the habit of contracting with a Head Cooly, for a supply of porters. In two instances, this Head Cooly, who is always linked with the Dewanjee, have demanded higher pay, and on its being refused them, have planted themselves at the door of the House, and effectually prevented the resort of other porters, and stopped its business. Complaints have been made to the Police, but though there is a law which was intended to afford relief in such cases no redress has ever been given. The matter has been made over to the Deputy Superintendent, who has done his utmost to patch up a reconciliation, between the parties. If there was vigor enough in our police to send such a scamp as this Head Cooly to the House of Correction for a month, there would soon be an end of such practices.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 10.

The Star has a letter from Macao of the 29th June, which gives intelligence not contained in the papers we have received. The writer states that the hatred of the English entertained by the Chinese population has again broken out, and that on the 15th a mob attacked the foreigners in the Company's Garden, but they made good their retreat to the Factory. The next day, the same mob attacked the Americans in their Gardens. The Yankees flew to arms, and a Chinaman is said to have been killed. On Monday, a notice was posted about the doors of the Factories stating that if 2,000 dollars were not paid as compensation to the relatives of the slain, the Factories would be burnt down. But they were still standing according to the last accounts. The mob appears to have been exasperated at the prospect of the rebuilding of the Factories, which one might have thought would have been an object of delight, as giving them the prospect of employment.

Sir Henry Pottinger has arrived at Bombay, and active preparations were in progress according to the last accounts to give him a suitable demonstration of the esteem in which he was held at his own Presidency.

Philodikeios, a correspondent of the Star, has come forward to assert that Mr. Salmond's removal from his Governorship in the Straits has been occasioned by his holding two spice plantations. We can assure him that this is not the case. The cause of his removal is freely canvassed in Calcutta among those who have any knowledge of the Straits. It is no secret, and those who know the merits of the case consider Government fully justified in the steps they have taken.

We are happy to find that Sir Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy, with his usual generosity, has honored the Parental Academic Institution with a donation of 2,000 Rupees.

The Calendar of the present Sessions of the Supreme Court—considering that there are seven sessions in the year—is unusually heavy. There are no fewer than twenty-six cases, some of which are heinous, without being legally intricate. Some of these might certainly have been disposed of without the “pride, pomp and circumstance” of a grand jury and a petty jury. The very first case on the list is a charge against Naboo Ghose for having feloniously and burglariously stolen from the house of one Gour Benik, Five Rupees in cash, and sundry articles of wearing apparel and metal utensils. The Burglary consists in having put his hand through the mat of which the sides of the hut are composed.

• MONDAY, AUGUST 12.

The Bombay papers announce the return of the Semiramis steamer with the July Mails. It appears that after running down to the most southern point of her course, she no sooner turned to the westward, than the Engine stopped, and it was discovered that the shaft of the Engine was broken. She had nothing for it then but to hoist her sails and return with the Mails to Bombay. It was on the 18th of July last year that the Memnon left Bombay. She went to pieces as we all know. It was on the 19th of July this year that the Semiramis took her departure; and she has occasioned a second disappointment. The Bombay Government will doubtless give suitable instructions to avoid this unlucky day in future.

Sir Charles Napier has deprived the mutinous Gith of their colours; and the leading mutineers have it appears swelled to 40. They are in the hands of a man of energy, and there will be no more mutiny in Scinde while the present Regiments and the present General in Chief are there. It appears that there has been another slight failure in a small expedition which was sent after the Beloochees into the desert. The commanding officer, Captain Mackenzie, received a stroke of the sun, and it became necessary to convey him back to our camp without delay. The men were so completely knocked up by the intolerable heat and thirst, as to be absolutely unfit for the duty on which they had been sent. They were, therefore, wisely led back. Had the enemy been aware of their situation, it is probable that few would have escaped.

The little Bank at Mussoorie has been gradually swelling its size. It has now a paid up Capital of 7,67,000 Rupees, and has granted loans for a lakh and a half of Rupees beyond its present resources. At a late meeting of the Shareholders, it was found to have yielded a return of Twelve per cent. It was resolved to divide only Ten, and to add the rest to a reserve fund. As a testimonial of gratitude to the Secretary, Major Angelo, for the very handsome dividend his exertions and ability had secured, they raised his salary to 1,000 Rupees a month. We manage these things better out here than they do at home. What would be thought of giving a Secretary and Manager of a Bank, with a Capital of £70,000 a salary of £1,200 a year?

TUESDAY, AUGUST 13.

The Hurkaru of this morning publishes a long and valuable letter, though rather too professional, from a Presidency Surgeon relative to the death of the late Mr. Lellie. The gist of the communication is contained in the following paragraph:—

“The suicidal attempt could be considered no more than one symptom among many of the violent and unmanageable cerebral diseases which destroyed him. And seeing that, in point of fact, it hastened not the fatal termination of the case, the medical men present unanimously agreed in attesting that the casualty occurred in consequence of the brain fever, and of that alone.”

The Bombay Courier received this morning states that the superintendent, Sir Robert Oliver, on hearing of the return of the Semiramis, immediately ordered the Sesostris to be got ready for the mails. She left Bombay on the 31st of July, with 4,072 additional letters, and 1,311 additional newspapers. Including the mails brought back, the Sesostris has conveyed 40,310 covers. If we had the same access to the records of the Post Office which is so freely given to our Bombay brethren, we should be able by adding to this number the covers sent by the Bentinck and the Tenasserim, to ascertain the extent of letters and newspapers sent home in the thirty days within which four steamers have left the shores of India.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 8.]

[VOL. VII.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 15.

The Hurkaru states, that on the departure of Sir George Pollock from Lucknow, General Raper will probably be appointed to the vacancy. This will place a fat berth of 3,000 Rupees a month at the disposal of the General Government.

The last Gazette contains the appointment of Mr. A. F. Donnelly, as Abkaree Superintendent at Dacca,—an office which has just been created. It appears that the new system originally established as an experiment under the agency of Mr. S. Palmer, and for the last two years directed by Mr. Donnelly, has worked so well in reducing intoxication and improving the public revenue, that Government has determined to continue and to extend it. Mr. S. Palmer has returned from the Cape and resumed his office; and a second Commissionership has been established for the eastern districts, of which Dacca is to be the Head Quarters, and over which Mr. Donnelly is to preside.

While the friends of Lord Ellenborough are getting up a testimonial to his worth, the friends of Mr. Thomas Horton, late Superintendent of the Diamond Harbour station, are not idle. The Members of the Calcutta Preventive Service yesterday presented him with a Cup and Salver, as a "token of their gratitude and esteem—gratitude for his many and kind services, and esteem for his sound principles, affability of manner, and equanimity of temper in the discharge of his official duties;" just the virtues for which a testimonial is to be presented to our late Governor-General.

Mr. L. Clint has been appointed to the post of Principal of the Hoogly College, which the papers have been giving away to Capt. Richardson for a month past.

The Assam Regiments are reorganized; the strength of the Light Infantry is to be increased by 100 privates; the 30 ponies it now entertains are to be restored to Government. The 2d Assam Seebundy corps is to be disbanded, and 100 of the most efficient men drafted into the Assam Light Infantry. An increase of two companies is authorized to the 1st Assam Seebundy Regiment, which will in future be considered a Light Infantry corps.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 16.

The intelligence from Cabul, if it could be relied on, is somewhat interesting, though the decidedly pacific propensities of the present administration deprive almost all the advices received from beyond the Indus of much of their interest. We now learn that Dost Mahomed is determined to proceed against Balkh; that his troops have been paid up, and that his Wuzeer is to lead them. It is also stated, that the Dost is anxious to draw closer the alliance between him and Yar Mahomed by a second marriage, which an agent has been sent to negotiate.

The Delhi Gazette states that it is rumoured that Jumalpoore will be given up as a Military station, and that the duties will be performed by the Assam troops. There is every reason to believe that the report is perfectly correct.

The Englishman of this morning, says "Have we not said as much as that the half-batta will be restored?"

SATURDAY, AUGUST 17.

The July Mail came in rather unexpectedly, but very opportunely yesterday, just in time to allow of the replies to letters by the express which goes this morning. We have too often been tantalized by the arrival of the home packets a few hours after the departure of the express. The present mail has brought to some, replies to letters of the middle of May. With a little contrivance, replies may always be secured to letters both here and at home in three months. It is worthy of remark, that this is the quickest mail ever received in Calcutta. Papers despatched from London at 6 p. m. on the 8th July were in Calcutta at noon on the 6th of August, in thirty-eight days and eighteen hours. The mail reached Bombay on the 6th, and but for the heaviness of the roads, owing to the rains, would have been in Calcutta twenty-four hours earlier; in which case, we should have had the communication in less than thirty-eight days.

The Hurkaru states that the present Mail brings out a despatch from the Court of Directors modifying the last amended Civil Service Leave of Absence Rules, and allows the indulgence of three months leave after thirty-three months of consecutive service without forfeiture. This despatch can of course have no reference to the organic changes relative to Civil furlough, which are probably now under consideration at the India House.

MONDAY, AUGUST 19.

"A Naive of —" has sent a letter simultaneously to the three daily journals of the Presidency,—most reprehensible practise—on the subject of the Bank of Bengal, which has a vast deal more money than it can safely employ, according to the rules of its charter. It has, as he says, a hundred and eighty-four lakhs of Rupees locked up in cash and Government securities. The Correspondent enquires whether "there are no businesses in the interior requiring fostering, no trades wanting support, no new and solid speculation to be generated?" We almost fear none which the Bank can touch with confidence. There appears to be no safe employment for the vast capital it enjoys. Both England and India is now labouring under the disadvantage of a redundant and unemployed capital; and unless there is a European war on the death of Louis Phillipe, or a Punjab war in this country, of which at present there is not the most remote chance, the inconvenience will continue to increase, and the interest of money must continue to fall. It is among the most remarkable phenomena in Calcutta, that although the profits of the Bengal Bank are said not to exceed at the present moment five and a half per cent. on its original stock, its shares bear a premium of seventy-five per cent.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 20.

We regret to learn from the Hurharu that of 42 boxes despatched by the Hindoostan steamer, 26 were left behind in Egypt and only 16 taken on. There can be no hesitation in saying that the treatment which we in this country have received in the matter of letters, is most shameful; it is such as no body of men in England would put up with for a week without such a remonstrance to Parliament as should make Colonel Maberly look about him. In the first place, the gallant Colonel has issued the most positive injunctions that no letters shall be sent from England by the Hindoostan or Bentinck, though he fully knew that they furnish the shortest and cheapest conveyance, and one that is most agreeable to the great bulk of the community here. When one gentleman in London attempted to make up a box of letters, he was threatened with a prosecution. Our Government here in a more liberal spirit allows packets to be made up and despatched by the Steamers which start from our own doors; but then the Post Office agents in Egypt who are under the control of the London Post Office, choose to frustrate this arrangement by leaving nearly two-thirds of the papers and letters behind! But we have no body to blame but ourselves. Let the merchants meet at the Town Hall and bring this grievance to the knowledge of the Governor-General and entreat him to use his influence with the Home authorities, and we should not fail to obtain redress.

A meeting of the subscribers to the Ellenborough Testimonial was held yesterday afternoon. There were twenty gentlemen present, and it was resolved that a Presidency Committee should be formed to open a correspondence with the various stations, with the view of raising subscriptions for the Testimonial to the late Governor-General. On the Committee were four civilians, two merchants, two barristers, and six military officers. Captain Herries, A. D. C. to Lord Ellenborough is the Secretary.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 21.

At a meeting of the Members of the Lyceum, held on Monday last, Mr. H. Torrens in the chair, it was determined to render the Institution a proprietary one, on the same principle as the Calcutta Public Library. The Hurharu congratulates the Muharaja Kallee Kissen Bahadoor, on the autograph letter he has been so fortunate as to receive from the Queen of England, and hopes he will shew his gratitude by imitating the example of Dwarkenath Tagore, and subscribing 8,000 Rupees to the Lyceum. Considering the well-known liberality of the Muharaja, we think the hint will not be thrown away upon him.

The Bombay Times quotes a letter from the Color-Sergeant of H. M's. 86th Royal Regiment, in which he denies that there had been a single Court Martial in that Regiment consequent on the unexpected donation of six month's batta, or 38 Rupees a piece which Lord Ellenborough gave to the men. This is one of the most singular facts we have heard for an age. It must be a very jewel of a Regiment for sobriety. We question whether there is any other corps in the British service, which would not exhibit scenes of riot and disorder, if thirty-eight Rupees a piece were put into the hands of seven or eight hundred men.—Friend of India.

OVERLAND MAIL.

We have just received our share of the London Mail (by the Express) down to the 8th of July, and hasten to give our town readers the pith of the Monthly Times Summary, to which our private letters, which are of the 8th July, add nothing particular in the way of news. There was a little political crisis, but Sir R. Peel turned the tables on his opponents. In regard to the sugar question, one of our letters says, that unless the Indian shoulder is applied to the wheel, there will assuredly be no relief obtained. The steam question is still in abeyance, but the principle and details have been settled. We have nothing (that we have yet seen in a necessarily hasty glance) of particular moment to our military friends, but we may be able to find something by to-morrow.

The Peninsular and Oriental Company had determined on sending an extra boat to meet the October Steamer at Alexandria.

Thomas Campbell the Poet is dead.

The French fleet destined for Tangiers, commanded by the Prince de Joinville, was passing Gibraltar on the 9th of July. On the evening of the 8th, the Admiral had an interview with the Governor, Sir Robert Wilson, the particulars of which had not transpired.

The only English Man-of-War at Gibraltar was the Warspite—there were none at Malta.

Ireland continues tranquil, notwithstanding the incarceration of the traversers—an event which it was expected by some would lead to an emute.

For the pacification of Spain, a coup d'etat is now proposed, in the shape of an alliance between Queen Isabella and the son of Don Carlos; but there are many obstacles to such an arrangement, and the opinion of the Spanish cabinet thereon has not yet been publicly announced.

The treaty for the annexation of Taxes to the United States has been rejected by the House of Representatives.—Engl. Inm. Extra,—Aug: 16.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 9.]

[VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, AUGUST 22.

The correspondent of the Bombay Courier in Egypt states that the health of Mehemet Ali is irrecoverably broken, that he is fast sinking into his grave, and that the next mail will probably bring the report of his death to India.

The Englishman states that the Governor of Bombay has received instructions from this Government not to permit any Bank Notes to be received at any Government Treasury at that Presidency, except those of the Bank of Bombay.

We are happy to learn from the Bombay Witness that our new Governor-General has appointed a Committee to open the boxes containing the principal part of the jewels taken at Hyderabad, and now lying at Bombay, for the purpose of selecting the most valuable to be returned to the Ameers.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 23.

A proposal submitted to the army for the admission of Mrs. Terranceau to the pension of a Colonel's widow has been negatived; the votes for the proposal were 652; against it, 818.

The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company have given notice that with the view of affording increased facilities and comfort to passengers from India, they intend to run an extra steam-ship between Alexandria, and Malta to meet the passengers at Alexandria, which arrived at Suez by the Hindustan and Bentinck from Calcutta, Madras, and Ceylon. At Malta they will be received on board one of the Company's vessels, the Braganza, 1,000 tons, and Tagus, 900 tons burthen respectively, plying on the Constantinople line monthly, and will be conveyed directly to London. We suppose, moreover, that passengers going to Malta, may also find their way by the Company's vessels to Constantinople, and from thence up the Black Sea and the Danube through Hungary.

The Delhi Gazette states that the young Raja Tookajee Holkar has actually commenced his education under the auspices of the Resident, Mr. Hamilton, and evinces great aptitude in his studies. The people are said generally to approve of the choice of a prince which has been made for them by the British Government.

From the same source we also learn that the new sovereign of Joudpore, having incurred the displeasure of some of his supporters, has been obliged to fly from his capital in consequence.

Our contemporary remarks with eminent truth, justice, and propriety, that "it is much to be regretted that disturbances should have broken out so soon after the new sovereign's accession to the throne;" and we most cordially join him in the hope he expresses that "the matters in dispute may soon be brought to a satisfactory conclusion."

SATURDAY, AUGUST 24.

We are happy to hear of the appointment of Raja Nurendru Krishnu Bahadur to the Deputy Magistracy of Mymensing. He belongs to one of the oldest families of the new nobility which have grown up with the establishment of our rule. It is a token for good when men of such high standing in Native society consent to take office under our government. It shews that Lord William Bentinck's system of binding up the hopes and prospects of the Native community with our administration has worked well.

The Harkara states that the gale of Wednesday night has not done much injury to the Indigo prospects of the Kishnagur district, while the rain which fell has benefitted the plant. The Englishman states that the French brig Castor drove from her anchors and pulled the William, which received considerable injury. The Sylph after parting from her anchor, drove ashore off the Custom House and received no injury. The Julia, laden with salt, had seven feet water in her hold, but one of the Assistant Harbour Masters with the assistance of coolies and the pumps, reduced it to two feet.

MONDAY, AUGUST 26.

The Englishman states his belief that Colonel Birch, Judge Advocate-General of the Army, will shortly proceed from Simlah to Calcutta, and that the movement is probably connected with a revision of the Mutiny Act, the establishment of Native Articles of War, and other contemplated improvements in military jurisprudence. Perhaps so. But it would be singular if such important changes in military jurisprudence were made without the personal advice and concurrence of the Commander-in-Chief. May not the departure of the Judge Advocate-General be the precursor of a general movement from Simlah to the south.

The papers announce that the Auckland Testimonial Committee have entered into arrangements with Mr. Weeks for a bronze statue of Lord Auckland, to be completed in four years. From 1,000 to 1,200 Rupees of the subscriptions have not been paid. The shortest way to get the money would be to publish the names of the defaulters.

On Tuesday night about 12 o'clock, the whole of the eastern wall of Captain Engledue's coal depôt at Garden Reach suddenly fell outwards, and buried nine men in its ruins. Of these eight are dead, the other is doing well.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 27.

The Madras papers state that the Nawab Eecram-ood-Dowlah, the son of the late Prime Minister Moneer-ool-Moolk, together with his son, has been murdered at Hyderabad by the Arabs.

The Englishman calls the attention of his Military readers to an advertisement by Messrs.

Thacker and Co. of a forthcoming pamphlet by Captain Macnaghten, on the subject of corporal punishment.

The portraits of Her Majesty and Prince Albert which were graciously promised to Dwarkanath Tagore on his leaving England, are now on their way to this country.

H. M. S. Cambrian, which brought Lord Ellenborough out to India, as Governor-General, by a very singular but not unusual coincidence, is said to have met the Tenasserim, taking back his Lordship under the frown of the Court of Directors.

The Honorary Secretary to the Bombay Great Eastern Railway has announced that no farther applications for shares will be received; we suppose, therefore the list is full!

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 28.

The Englishman of this morning, says an interest is excited among those who are connected by office or expectation with the Government of Bengal to know who is to be Deputy-Governor when Mr. Bird goes home. Our contemporary has heard that their will be no Deputy, but a full Governor; that Sir Henry Hardinge is about to assume the reins himself, and he applauds the resolution. For our parts, we can only say that they who live longest will see most.

Dr. Woosnam of the Bombay Medical service, who has been attached to the political Staff of Sir Henry Portinger in China, has obtained permission to return with him to England.—Friend of India.

OVERLAND MAIL.

The Hindostan steamer will leave Calcutta for Suez on the 16th, proximo.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE, INTALLY.

THE VERY REV. DR. KENNEDY, Principal.

St. John's College is designed chiefly to educate youth for the sacred ministry, for the Vicariate Apostolic of Bengal. The abundant benediction which it has pleased God to bestow on the mission of Bengal, the constantly increasing numbers of the Catholic community, and the necessity of establishing new missions in different parts of the Vicariate all demand that provision should be made here immediately, to educate candidates for the service of the sacred ministry, in order to multiply the number of labourers in the Vineyard of the Lord; and to secure a succession of good Pastors for the Vicariate.

The Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic, although for a long time deeply solicitous to secure for the Church of Bengal an advantage of such great moment for its permanent welfare, abstained from pressing the subject on the notice of his generous flock, from a feeling, that the demands made on them, for the Orphanage and other charitable purposes, were as much as their circumstances would allow them to meet.

The same feeling would still prevent him from calling their attention to the subject, if, through a singular manifestation of the Divine Goodness, a House and Demesne had not been placed at his disposal, (which cost the late Proprietor the immense sum of about 100,000 Rupees,) for the establishment of a College. The conditions annexed to this foundation are such, as the Archbishop confidently hopes can be complied with, so as to satisfy fully the wishes of the benevolent Founder, and, at the same time, secure for the Bengal Mission, an Institution, which, with the blessing of Heaven, will in a few years, send forth a holy and a learned Priesthood, qualified by their education and knowledge of the language and usage of the country, to be the Pastors of the faithful, and the Herald of salvation to those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death.

As the Funds under the administration of the Archbishop suffice to provide for the education and support of six students, it is intended, as soon as circumstances permit, to select candidates for these scholarships, by concursus, or according to merit to be ascertained by examination. For the present young men who have wholly or nearly completed their classical studies in some of the approved Seminaries of Great Britain and Ireland will be chosen, in order to attain more expeditiously the object for which the Seminary is established and to give time to the Anglo Indian Youth who aspire to the Priesthood, to make such a proficiency in the English, Greek and Latin languages and Mathematics, as will qualify them to compete for the above mentioned Scholarships. Due notice will be given to candidates, of the subject-matter of the examination to be undergone by them. In accordance with Catholic discipline, testimonials of exemplary conduct and attention to the duties of religion, must be produced before any candidate is admitted to examination.

Such benefactions as the faithful may bestow on the Institution, will be employed in purchasing a suitable Library, in furnishing a Hall with the apparatus required for the Study of Natural Philosophy, in erecting such additional buildings as may be found necessary, and finally in founding free places for candidates for the sacred ministry, of distinguished piety and attainments.

In order to promote these important objects, and to assist in defraying the expenses of the Institution, arrangements have been made for educating in St. John's College twelve young gentlemen not designed for the clerical profession, at the monthly charge of thirty Rupees for each Boarder and of twenty-one for each day Boarder. The course of education will comprise the Greek and Latin Classics, French, Reading, Writing, Arithmetic, &c. English Grammar, Geography, History, the use of the Globes, Logic, Mathematics, Natural Philosophy, and the native languages generally in use. No pupils will be received under six or beyond fourteen years of age.

Payment to be made quarterly in advance, and a month when once entered upon to be charged for in full. No extra charge will be made for Medicines and for the attendance of any other besides the appointed Physician of the Seminary. The monthly pension fixed for Boarders includes all charges, for washing, and for the use of books and table and bedroom furniture.

Reference for further information to be made to the Principal of the College.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 10.]

THURSDAY, AUGUST 29.

The Star has a letter this morning on the subject of Assam Tea, but its value is diminished by the absence of all note either of place or date. It informs us that the Teas of the present year are not better than they were in former years, but that the Assam Teas have realized as high a price in London as those from China; that the quantity sold amounted to 700 Chests, hence the sum obtained was a mercantile not a fancy price. Although many have begun to despond in reference to the progress of Indian Tea in the English market, yet the prospects have of late appeared brighter, both as it regards Assam and Kemaon.

We have forgotten to notice that the prohibition to export Coolies from the other Presidencies, which we believe the Press has been unanimous in opposing, has been taken off by orders from home. There is reason to think that the next step will be to open the ports of India for emigration to British Guiana, and the West India Islands and we must then we fear expect a renewal of those scenes of distress and mortality which have brought into question the propriety of these long and distant voyages.

The Hurkaru in a brief notice of the Foreign Quarterly states, as a fact, that when Lord Palmerston had determined to march an army across the Indus to raise the siege of Herat, he was obliged to ask an officer who had lately travelled through Central Asia, "where Herat was?" A charge of such ignorance against a man so well informed as Lord Palmerston, seems scarcely credible. When Lord Castlereagh went to Vienna to assist in settling the affairs of Europe after the downfall of Napoleon, he is reported to have asked the Austrian Minister to point out on the map, where the "Valais" was situated, as he said he had never heard of any such province before.

The Governor of Madras is said to have received instructions from the Court of Directors that the sale price of salt manufactured within that Presidency should be reduced to One Company's Rupee the maund.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 30.

The Englishman has a letter from Arracan, which states that a teak forest has been discovered in that province, or rather that it has now been discovered for the first time, that there is access to it by the Kulladyne or Arracan river. Mr. Brown has just returned from an expedition up that river, and has brought with him a tree, thirty feet in length and eighteen inches in diameter. He has obtained a grant of the land, and will in all probability be enabled to give this improving province another article of export.

Dr. A. Battachi, an Indian gentleman, who has resided some time with Abd-el-Kader, and has recently arrived in Calcutta, intends to publish a journal of his travels in Africa. He was made prisoner by the Arabs in 1837, under the walls of Constantina, entered the service of the Emir in 1838, and left it in 1842. He has visited the interior of Africa from the frontiers of Morocco to Egypt.

The news given from beyond the Indus in the last Delhi Gazette, is as follows:—No intelligence had arrived from Herat for some time, which greatly perplexed the Vakeel of Yar Mahomed at Cabul, as he was quite uncertain whether the Persians had taken Herat or not. Letters from Bamecan announced the approach of the Uzbegs to that fort on their way to Cabul. Dost Mahomed set himself to the task of repelling them, and ordered off Mr. Campbell's troops, but there was a hitch in regard to arrears. We shall of course soon have whether the Persians have taken Herat, or the Uzbegs, Bamecan. It is singular that this double expedition against Afghanistan should be moving down at one and the same time from the North and from the West. The plot evidently thickens and the interest in matters beyond the Indus, which has been dying away for some time, begins to revive apace.

The Agra Bank has agreed to reduce its rates of interest on loans according to the period for which money is taken up. The lowest rate is now eight per cent., just double the sum the Bengal Bank charges for a loan on a deposit of of Company's paper.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 31.

A correspondent of the Hurkaru, who assumes the name of Truth, has sent a long catalogue of crimes committed in a district, which, from the initials, can be no other than Midnapore. He states that the Dewan of a certain Minor Raja is in the habit of inflicting torture on the ryots. If we are not mistaken in the guess we have formed of the name of the correspondent, he was instrumental also in denouncing the use of torture in the last district in which he resided, in the north of Bengal. He farther states that the Dewan compelled the widow of the late Raja to ascend the funeral pile of her husband, and that the Commissioner informed the Sudder Board that she died suddenly two or three hours after the Raja. Of course this charge cannot remain without investigation. The public authorities of the district must instantly enquire into the truth of this heinous accusation, and either bring the villain of a Dewan to punishment, or expose the informant.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 2.

The departure of the Hindoostan, has been postponed from the 15th to the 18th, which is the latest safe day that could have been assigned to her. It would certainly have been more convenient to the community to have delayed her till after the arrival of the express—that is supposing the letters sent by her are likely to meet with more attention than the last batch,—but, it was necessary to keep in mind that if delayed here too long, she might have reached Suez after the arrival of the Bombay vessel.

The removal of Sir George Pollock, we are told, will occasion the following movements :—Colonel Richmond obtains the richest berth in the gift of Government, the sinecure Residency of Lucknow. Major Broadfoot is to be transferred from the Superintendence of the Tenasserim Provinces to that of British affairs on the North-west frontier, an exchange in every point of view desirable, because he is so well fitted for the political duties beyond the Sutlege, on the one hand; and on the other, he has unfortunately been the cause or the victim of extreme prejudices at Moulmein. In either case, his administration of those provinces was likely to have been continuously cramped. Captain Durand succeeds him at Moulmein.

The latest accounts from Shikarpore extend to the 24th of August, at which time, that station, as well as Sukkur, was comparatively healthy. Indeed, it is said that the troops were perfectly satisfied with the climate, the pay—that is, the pay according to the Governor General's notification—and every thing. The banks of the Indus must always be extremely unhealthy on the subsidence of its waters: but there are doubtless years of extraordinary disease and mortality, when the Natives of the country suffer as severely and as extensively as strangers, and the past year was very possibly one of these years of death. In the year 1841, the whole of the camp of the fugitive Nusser Khan suffered from fever, so that scarcely an individual escaped.

The second Annual General Meeting of the Proprietors of the Bank of Western India, was held at Bombay on the 21st August. It was a very singular meeting. First, The Report of the Directors stating the progress made in establishing the Bank, was read, and also the opinion of the Board of Direction that the Reserved Fund should be augmented to Twenty lakhs of Rupees. Secondly, It was resolved that the very satisfactory report now read be adopted and printed. Thirdly, It was proposed that two gentlemen be re-elected Directors of the Bank. Fourthly, That the Directors be thanked for their careful, discreet, and satisfactory management of the Bank, Fifthly, That Mr. Cargill, the Managing Director, be especially thanked for his continued diligent attention. Last of all, the Chairman was thanked likewise;—but although the Bank was said to be in a state of the most miraculous prosperity, no dividend was voted.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 3.

Madras papers give a melancholy account of an accident which befel the Larkins while in the Roads. She had 1,200 bales of Cotton on board which caught fire, and nearly consumed the ship. The Captain had been married the previous day.

The Bombay Courier says that some of the coolies recently returned from the Mauritius complain of having experienced the most barbarous treatment there. This is the first instance in which the conduct of the Planters to the labourers has been called in question on any thing like credible evidence; and the charge should be sifted to the bottom, before the extension of emigration to the West India Islands receives the sanction of Government.

Some correspondence has been published in the papers between Messrs. Munro and Co. and the Steam authorities relative to steam freight. In the present instance, the authorities are right, and the merchants in error. Whenever a cubic foot of merchandise exceeds in weight 30 lbs. it is charged by weight, and not by measurement. Formerly 24 lbs. was the standard. It was enlarged to 30 to enable cases of books to be sent by steam by measurement. Most unfortunately, a cubic case of books weighs more than 30 lbs., and the supposed relief is therefore all moonshine. If there was any hope that any remonstrance would meet with any attention, we would venture to suggest that the rates of the charge be inserted in the Bill. It can give no trouble to insert them; and it would be some satisfaction to the senders to know upon what principle the charge so invariably exceeds their expectation.

The Agra and United Service Bank has declared a dividend at the rate of Eleven per Cent. for the last half year.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 4.

The Agra Ukhbar is in ecstasy at having been made the channel of communicating to the public the fact that Sir Charles Napier, whom Lord Ellenborough made Governor of Scinde, with the title of Excellency, has subscribed 800 Rs. to the testimonial. The other officers in Scinde have followed the example of the General in Chief, and the subscriptions have received a considerable augmentation. We should not be surprised to find them reach £5,000. The Ukhbar has fallen back upon his old plan of a bi-weekly publication.

The mortality at Ahmednuggur from the cholera appears to have been fearful. Mr Forbes of the Civil Service, the son of Col. Messiter of H. M. 17th foot, Colonel Deshon, Lieut. Dudgeon, and Ensign Bourke, all of that corps, and Assistant Surgeon Richardson, have fallen victims to the disease, and many men both of the Queen's 17th and the Artillery. Strange to say not a single case of cholera has occurred in the 15th N. I.—Friend of India.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ONE INTERESTED should address the Vicar Apostolic of Bengal on the subject of his letter.

The letter of our Bombay Correspondent IMPARTIAL on the state of a school established at "Bombay from the Funds of the late Mr. D'Souza," of Calcutta, requires authentication.

The poetry signed F. will not suit our pages.

Our esteemed correspondent C. A. C. must bear with us till next Saturday, when we hope to publish his Letter No. XVIII. as well as our reply to a writer in the Christian Advocate, who signs himself CANDOUR, on the subject of Transubstantiation,—both of which have been kept back to make room for our report of Bishop Olliffe's arrival.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER (Agra) has been received.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 11.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1844.

[VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 5.

The Englishman states that an Officer who has been recently suffering from illness, and had been at Dr. Chapman's quarters next to the General Hospital, was lying on his sofa a few evenings ago, when a soldier abruptly entered and demanded a glass of grog. The gentleman pointed to a side-board on which was a bottle of brandy, and the fellow helped himself. He then asked the time, when the gentleman took a gold repeater from under his pillow, which he had no sooner done than the ruffian snatched it out of his hand and made off with it. No trace of the robber has been found. It is ascribed as usual to the 10th, who now bear the brunt of all the crimes committed by European agency in Calcutta.

The Bombay Times gives a letter from an Officer, in which he states, that if a remittance be made through the Pay Office for a wife and children, the Income Tax is levied. But if the word wife be omitted, and children only retained, it is not levied. Thus, upon a small remittance of £25 a year, fourteen shillings and sevenpence were deducted for the tax. The opinion generally prevalent in India is, that all incomes under £150 are exempt; but this scale does not evidently apply to military pay or pensions. We have known instances in which widow's pensions, even of inconsiderable amount, have been subjected to the Tax—which is after all the most reasonable, the most honest, the most equitable, and the most impartial tax in England.

All the animosities which existed against Sir Henry Pottinger in China appear to have entirely vanished on his touching the soil of Bombay. The whole community seems to have been anxious to do honor to the man whose success and whose renown sheds a lustre on the Presidency in which he was reared to greatness.

The Durham says, the friends and admirers of Lord Ellenborough will be glad to learn that the Tenasserim safely reached Galle on the 14th ultimo, after a very rough and disagreeable passage. As we are neither friends nor admirers of his Lordship, we are free to confess that we are sorry to hear that his Lordship had a rough and disagreeable passage. This little blunder reminds one of Sir Robert Peel's celebrated letter to the Lord Mayor of London on the death of William the Fourth. We quote from a rusty memory. "I am sorry to inform your Lordship that it has pleased Divine Providence to release his Majesty from a state of pain and suffering."

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 6.

The Delhi Gazette states that Sir George Pollock was to quit Lucknow on the 1st instant for Allahabad, and expected to reach Calcutta in time to take his seat in Council as Mr. Bird quitted it.

The Assam Steamer arrived at Mirzapore early on the 30th August. The value of the goods shipped by Native merchants on this vessel, in the present trip is said to amount to seven lakhs of Rupees, and Native insurances have been effected on this property at the rate of one-half per cent. This fact shows the extreme caution of the Native character. The perfect security which has attended the conveyance of goods by the river steamers has induced European merchants to relinquish all idea of effecting insurances on them; yet the Natives cannot, it appears, be induced to incur the smallest risk, and willingly pay a small percentage on their merchandize to obviate the remote possibility of loss.

The Delhi Gazette has intelligence from Cabul to the 8th of August. It is stated that Sirdar Akram Khan, who had been sent to repel the Uzbegs from Bamegan, was attacked by them, when twenty men were killed on either side, and neither army gained any advantage. We want more particular and correct information than has yet been given of the advance of the Tartars towards Cabul and the success they have met with. Dost Mahomed, it is said, was unable to send reinforcements, as the troops at his disposal were required, as usual, for the collection of revenue in the districts around Cabul.

The Englishman states, on the authority of letters from Bundelkund of the 26th ultimo, that Phulwan Sing, the great insurgent ruler, had surrendered himself to the Agent, and that his chief, the ex-Raja Parechut of Jeitpore, had intimated his willingness to accept the terms offered by the British Government, 2,000 Rs. a-month on condition of his living within the Provinces.

A ruffianly attack has been made on Major Wood, principal Aid-de-Camp to the Governor-General. On passing the Hospital gate of the Fort yesterday evening he perceived two Europeans, who looked at him very earnestly. Soon after, being near a lamp-post, he took out his watch to see the hour, and on riding a few paces forward, heard a shot fired and felt himself stunned. On reaching Government House he found himself bleeding from a wound in the temple. Up to eleven at night he was doing well. Information was immediately given to the Magistrate but no trace could be found of the miscreants.

The Mussoorie Bank is about to establish a branch at Delhi. Our Delhi contemporary welcomes the stranger, but wishes he had been home born.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 7.

The Englishman informs us that the Hon. Mr. Cushing, the American Plenipotentiary to the Emperor of China, has negotiated a treaty with Keshing, the exact counterpart of that already concluded between the Chinese and the British authorities. The Americans have, it seems, succeeded in obtaining a small reduction on the import duty of lead, and may therefore crow over Sir Henry Pottinger. This settlement of the business at Canton will of course render it unnecessary for the young Plenipotentiary to go to Peking. We now wait to see whether the Minister of the Great Nation will be content without a personal introduction to the Dragon Throne.

We publish from the Hurkaru a full account of the outrage committed on Major Wood. It appears that the ruffians were not men of the 10th, but soldiers from Dum-Dum; that the pistol which they fired did not take effect, and that the wound, was occasioned by a large brickbat which they threw with fatal aim at the head of the Major. Both the men have been apprehended. It appears that within an hour of the attack, they had sold the Major's fiat, and got grog enough to make them perfectly drunk.

The Bhaskur, describes the state of the Police in the Kishnagur district as being insupportable. It affirms that a village, called Govindpore, which stands near Santipore, which is now the residence of respectable persons, was once also the abode of peace and security. But sad indeed is now the state of things. Scarcely "a night passes without four or five robberies taking place." Five robberies a-night, at the rate of one hundred and fifty robberies a-month! Really this is too bad—to be true. When will the natives learn that the natural result of exaggerations, is not to obtain a kind of half credit for a statement, but to ensure its being discredited altogether?

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 9.

We regret to learn that the paper called the Hills, published at Mussoorie, and which has been conducted with much spirit, has ceased for the present to exist, in consequence of the numerous other engagements of the Editor. We hope it will turn out to be only a case of suspended animation.

The Englishman publishes a private letter from Simla, which states that the Head-Quarters will remain at Simla, to which place the Governor-General will resort, and that Sir Hugh Gough will go home in a few days, via Bombay. Our contemporary states positively that the Governor-General will not go to Simla, unless there should be something far more formidable in the aspect of affairs beyond the Sutlege than appears at present. As to the departure of Sir Hugh Gough for England, which some affirm with confidence and others with diffidence, it is clear that nothing certain is or can be known at present.

A Government notification published on Saturday last, informs the public that the advertisement-bills on England on the hypothecation of goods for the season of 1844-45 will be limited to £800,000, at the rate of 1s. 11d. the Rupee; and that it is the wish of the Court of Directors gradually to discontinue this mode of remitting funds to England, and to resort exclusively to the sale of bills on London. It will remember that Lord Ellenborough was anxious to have accomplished this object like any other thing à la main, but the Directors resisted the sudden change and have now given sufficient notice of it to the public, to prevent its being injurious.

Mauritius papers to the 13th ultimo have been received, stating that there had been a great mortality among the cattle, which had caused great uneasiness.—Government had therefore ordered a particular form of prayer to be put up in the Churches.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 10.

Col. Birch, the Deputy Judge-Advocate-General, left Simla for Calcutta on the 2d instant, and may be expected about the 25th.

The Bombay Government has not yet fixed a day for the despatch of the next steamer, which has hitherto prevented the publication of any notice from our own Post Office. The Post Master has however just issued a notification that the 19th of the month will probably be the latest safe day. The mails by the Hindoostan will be closed on the evening of the 17th; but the fate of those which were previously sent by her, makes it doubtful with some whether it would be altogether safe to entrust letters and papers to a vessel which is considered by the London Post Office authorities in the light of an interloper. It appears, however, sufficiently probable that these packets will reach England, though at a somewhat later period; and we would still encourage our friends to avail themselves of the Hindoostan.

The Madras papers mention the arrival at that Presidency of Mr. Justice Burton from New South Wales, to take his seat on the bench of the Supreme Court. Mr. Burton is, we believe, the parent of that admirable system of Insolvent Law which was published some little time back in the Hurkaru, the introduction of which into this country would be a great blessing.

The Tenasserim, Steamer, with Lord Ellenborough on board, sailed from Galle on Friday the ultimo a day earlier than was anticipated.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 11.

The Hurkaru of this morning gives us the gratifying information that the Managing Director of the New River Steam Company has submitted the plan of the Boats to the Directors, and that they will be sent home by the present mail. A London Committee has been appointed, and Mr. R. M. Stephenson, who goes home in the Hindoostan, will probably be appointed their man of business. This Company has offered to purchase the Assam Steamer, for 90,000 Rs., but the offer has been rejected; perhaps wisely. As the charges for freight on this vessel have now risen above even those of the Company's Steamers, she must be making a very mint of money. Meanwhile Mr. Robertson holds out the certainty of having the boats of the Company he represents, laid on the line without any delay; two additional competitors will reduce freight, even if we should not obtain either the Rajmahal canal or the Rail-road.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 12.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1844.

[Vol. VII.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 12.

The amount of subscriptions to the Ellenborough Testimonial, as published in this morning's Englishman, exceeds Thirty Thousand Rupees.

The Bombay Prabhakar complains bitterly of the increased tax of half a Rupee a maund which a recent Act imposes on the article of Salt, and states that it will be most unpalatable to the inhabitants of that Presidency. The Englishman very properly asks what they would say to the inhabitants of this Presidency, who are subject to a tax of three Rupees a maund.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 13.

The two Artillerymen apprehended for the assault on Major Wood have been committed to take their trial at the Sessions.

We are happy to learn that Government has resolved to throw a suspension bridge across the Jumna at Agra, opposite the Custom House under the executive officer.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 14.

The proposal to establish a branch of the Mussoorie Bank at Delhi, has "got up the dander" of the people of that imperial city, who are determined to have a bank of their own. A meeting has been held in the Assembly Rooms, and as all the shares had been already taken up, the business was easily managed. Applications for 400 shares in excess of the capital were received before the meeting closed; the Capital is Ten lacs. This is the age of Indian Banks. With this new bantling we shall be able to reckon no fewer than Eight. Mirzapore we suppose will have its own Bank next.

The Governor-General gave a farewell entertainment to Mr. Bird at Government House on Thursday evening, when about eighty sat down to dinner. Sir H. Hardinge broke through the usual rule of Government House, and in a very neat and appropriate speech proposed the health of Mr. Bird. Mr. Bird made an appropriate and feeling reply.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 16.

We are happy to learn from the Hurkaru that an enquiry has been instituted by the Midnapore Authorities into the charges which have been brought in the columns of the Hurkaru against the Dewan of the Raja of Mysadul; that the Deputy Magistrate who was deputed to the place released two persons who had been illegally confined by that personage and that Perwannahs have been issued for the apprehension of the Dewan himself. It is also stated that strong suspicions exist that the Suttie alluded to did actually take place. Strange that such a crime should be committed without discovery within a hundred miles of the metropolis.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 17.

Captain Maclean, one of the Aid-de-Camps of the late and the present Governor-General has been appointed to succeed the late Captain L. Mackintosh as Superintendent of the affairs of the Mysore Princes.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 18.

The Englishman states that Phulwan Singh, the Bundelkund Banditti leader, after being three days in Colonel Sleeman's Camp, (having come in under a safe conduct,) expressed himself dissatisfied with the terms offered both for himself and his Chief, the Ex-Rajah, Pareechut, and again went off to the jungles.

The threatened attack of the Arabs on Aden has passed off. It seems the benefits derived from the expenditure of the English settlement, and the encouragement of trade, have produced their natural effect in disposing the neighbouring Chiefs to decline taking part with the Imaum of Senna in his fanatical war against the Kaffirs, and at the same time news of domestic treachery compelled this chief to turn homewards, and look after his own business.—Friend of India.

OVERLAND MAIL.

The express from Bombay, bringing intelligence to the 7th ultimo, arrived on Thursday afternoon about 3 o'clock. The intelligence is not very interesting. We subjoin the substance of it:—

Sir Henry Hardinge has been appointed a Knight Grand Cross of the Bath.

Sir Robert and Lady Sale and party landed at Lyme Regis from the True Briton, on 22d July, and were received with demonstrations of public congratulation. A pension of 500*l.* per annum has been bestowed on Lady Sale. Sir Robert Sale and Sir William Nott are to be entertained by the Court of Directors on the 16th August.

We have great pleasure in stating that the plan of a bi-monthly intercourse between this country and India has at length been finally arranged, and that it is fixed to come into operation in January next. The East India Company undertake the conveyance of one mail a month, as at present, to Bombay. The second mail is to be conveyed from Southampton to Calcutta direct, dropping Bombay letters, &c., at Ceylon, from whence a mail is to be dispatched to China. This latter service, including both the Calcutta and China lines, has been entrusted to the Peninsular and Oriental Company, who have obtained a contract for 160,000*l.* per annum, of which sum the East India Company have agreed to pay 70,000*l.* and Her Majesty's Government 90,000*l.* a-year.

In the case of the Queen v. O'Connell and others, the arguments upon the points raised by the Writ of Error were brought to a close in the House of Lords early in the past month, when certain questions were propounded for the opinion of the common-law justices and the Chief Justices of the Common Pleas requested time for consideration. As the judges are on circuit they cannot meet for the consideration of those questions till after the 23rd inst. so that judgment will not be given before the 29th or 30th of Aug., when the prorogation will immediately take place.

British intervention has not yet succeeded in accommodating the offences between Morocco and France, but there is reason to hope matters may yet be reconciled. The English fleet was at Gibraltar, and the French at Cadiz, where the Prince de Joinville waits the answer of the Emperor to the ultimatum of France.

Lady Emily Hardinge and family have left Whitehall gardens for West Park, near Tonbridge Wells. It is not as yet determined at what period of the autumn her ladyship and family will depart for India, although September has been named.

AUGUST 7.

ACCOUCHEMENT OF HER MAJESTY,—BIRTH OF A PRINCE.

We are most happy to announce, that on the morning of August 6th, at ten minutes before eight o'clock, the QUEEN was safely delivered of a PRINCE, at Windsor Castle. In the room with her Majesty were, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Dr. Looock, and Mrs. Lilly, the monthly nurse. And in the rooms adjoining were the other medical attendants, Sir J. Clark and Dr. Ferguson, and also the Lady in Waiting on the Queen. At half-past eight o'clock the following official bulletin was issued:—

"Windsor Castle, Aug. 6th, 1844.

Half-past Eight, a. m.

"The Queen was safely delivered of a PRINCE this morning at fifty minutes past seven o'clock.

"JAMES CLARK, M.D.

"CHARLES LOOOCK, M.D.

"ROBERT FERGUSON, M.D.

Intimation of her Majesty's illness was forwarded from Windsor Castle to town, at six o'clock in the morning, and the intelligence was received at the Home Office at a quarter-past seven o'clock. Summonses, which had been previously prepared, were immediately forwarded to the Lord Chancellor, Sir R. Peel, Sir J. Graham, the Duke of Buccleuch, Lord Wharnccliffe and other Cabinet Ministers, requesting them to proceed forthwith to Windsor. The Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Buccleuch, Lord Privy Seal, Sir J. Graham, Secretary of State for the Home Department, the Earl De La Warr, Lord Chamberlain, and the Earl of Jersey, Master of the House, were the first to arrive at Windsor, having left town by a special train, which arrived at the Slough terminus of the Great Western Railway at 25 minutes past eight o'clock. The Ministers and Officers of State immediately proceeded to the Castle in one of the Royal carriages, which was in readiness.—Sir R. Peel and Lord Stanley arrived shortly afterwards, having travelled from town by a second special train, and were likewise conveyed to the Castle from the station in a Royal carriage and four. The Duke of Wellington arrived at the Castle soon after nine o'clock, having travelled from by a third special train. The Ministers, who did not arrive at the Castle until her Majesty had delivered a Prince. The necessary forms having afterwards been gone through, Sir J. Graham and his colleagues immediately left Windsor, and arrived in town at half past 11 o'clock; Sir R. Peel waited some time longer, and returned to Whitehall Gardens at a quarter-past one o'clock. On the return of the Ministers to town, summonses were immediately issued by direction of Lord Wharnccliffe for holding a Privy Council at three o'clock. The Council was attended by Prince Albert, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and most of the Cabinet Ministers. The Archbishop of Canterbury was directed by the Council to prepare a Form of Prayer and Thanksgiving to Almighty God for her Majesty's safe delivery. The above official bulletin was posted at the Home Office and at the Mansion House this morning and excited the greatest interest. The Park and Tower guns were fired at one o'clock, and the bells of the metropolitan churches rang merry peals during the morning. In the course of the day several special messengers were sent off to foreign courts to announce the auspicious event.

It is rumoured that in case the three new regiments to be raised in India are all added to the strength of one Presidency, the officers will, nevertheless, be selected from a general gradation list of the service, which is to include the officers of all three Presidencies.

The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company intend despatching the Precursor for India, on 10th Sept., to be followed by the Lady Mary Wood, as soon as she can be prepared for the voyage, so as to be able to undertake the line from Suez to Calcutta in August next. They intend building, without delay, three vessels of 400 horse power each, for the mail service to China; and we have heard of other arrangements, connected with this line, which may prove advantageous to Bombay, if it should ultimately be decided to start these latter vessels from that port for Hong Kong, calling at Galle for the China mails. The Lady Mary Wood is to be employed on the Calcutta line only till a more powerful vessel can be supplied.

Lieut-Gen Lord Keane, Col. of the 43d, is at present seriously ill.

The wounded men from the army of Gwalior disembarked from the ship Windsor, on the morning of the 22d inst. and proceeded forthwith to Chatham, in Medical charge of Surgeon Wood, 9th Royal Lancers, and Asst. Surgeon Mapleton, H.M. 40th foot, who were selected at Gwalior for the arduous duty. It would appear that the result has been most satisfactory, only one casualty having occurred amongst those brave fellows on the voyage. It is gratifying to learn, too, the very great kindness and attention that were evinced towards the wounded by the authorities in India, in proof of which we need only mention that the Governor-General himself visited and comforted them in the field of battle, and repeatedly in their respective hospitals, and subsequently, when at Calcutta, he personally superintended the arrangements that were being made for their embarkation.—Brit. Est. Sep. 18.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

NO. 13.]

[VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 19.

A notification has issued from the Bombay Government fixing the departure of the Monthly Mail Steamers from October to May next for the 1st of each month, except in December, when the first day falling on a Sunday, the vessel starts on Monday.

The papers mention a very extraordinary instance of desertion. Ensign Moseley, 38th N. I. has left Meerut in company with Hospital Apprentice Courtenay and Private Nowlan of the 2d European Regiment. What can be the object of the young gentleman's peregrinations it is difficult to divine.

The Bombay papers state that Alloo Paroo, the notorious villain who was concerned in the burning of the Belvidere, has been captured at Jinjeera, about fifty miles south of Bombay. He was at the head of a conspiracy which is supposed to have been instrumental in the destruction of not less than a quarter of a million sterling of property.

The Delhi Gazette says the tocsin of war in the Punjab appears at length to sound. The disputes between Heera Sing and Golab Sing must be decided by the sword. It has long been suspected that the country was too narrow to hold the uncle and nephew. It is now said that Golab Sing, has expressed an anxiety to obtain the services of the European officers discharged at Lahore, and that he has written to General Ventura, who will doubtless refuse his offers. In these squabbles our Government can now have little interest, since the introduction of a pacific policy into the Government. If Golab Sing gains the upper hand, a strong Government will be established in the Punjab capable of maintaining the relations of peace and war, which is all we could desire.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 20.

The intelligence from beyond the Sutlege continues to wear a warlike aspect. Sheikh Inadooddeen who had been sent to mediate between Heera Sing and his Uncle and Aunt is said to have returned without success; and Heera Sing has ordered 20,000 artillery, 20,000 horse, and 40,000 foot soldiers to march against Raja Golab Sing.

An attempt has been made to assassinate Ram Rao Phalkeah, the chief Minister of Gwalior. As he was returning home in his palankeen from the palace, and his guards were a little a-head of him, some one discharged a carabine loaded with shot at him. Two men who stood near his palankeen, were wounded, but the Minister escaped. No trace of the assassin could be discovered. It is said, that there is a deep laid conspiracy to get rid of the Minister and get up a general revolution.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21.

The public will be happy to learn that the express which left Calcutta on Wednesday at 3 P. M. with letters for the Hindoostan, was in time for that vessel.

The Isabella Cooper, now lying in the harbour, had a most narrow escape from being burnt on Thursday last. About eight in the evening smoke was observed to rise from below the deck. The alarm was instantly given, and all hands were employed in extinguishing the flame, which was eventually got under. She was saved entirely by the vigorous exertions of those who came to the rescue, for near the place where ignition began, there was a large quantity of castor oil, and other highly combustible goods. The cause of the fire is not known; it is not traced to incendiarism; possibly some of the crew got too near the rum cask with a light.

We alluded some time ago to the rapid increase of European vagrants in Calcutta. We are now happy to find that Mr. Patton, the Chief Magistrate, has taken up the matter, and placed in confinement many of the indolent characters who could find no security for their good behaviour.

Sir George Pollock, G. C. B., was yesterday, the 20th, sworn in as third ordinary member of the Council of India, in consequence of the departure of Mr. W. W. Bird for Europe.

It appears that some gambling speculators in Calcutta, whom the late Act has smashed, have been to the Magistrate to ask whether the disposal of an article by private lottery or raffle would be an infraction of the Act, to which his Worship has very properly replied that it would.

The Iron work for the Suspension Bridge which is to be erected over the Jumna at Agra, it is said is manufactured in Calcutta.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22.

The Hurkaru has important news from Cabul. We heard some time ago that the Uzbeys had come down and taken Bamecan. This is now confirmed. Dost Mahomed, hearing of this, set out with his army from Cabul, but after proceeding thirty miles, sent for his sons Akbar Khan and Afzul Khan, and pointing out the state of blind security in which the enemy lay, gave them 4,000 horsemen a-piece to attack them. It is said that the Uzbeys thereupon fled to Balk; and that the three brothers united their forces and pursued them to that city, where a bloody battle was fought in which the three totally routed their opponents, losing only 127 Affghans. Above a thousand fell on the side of the Uzbeys. Thus it appears that the fortunate Dost is delivered from the enemy which threatened him from Turkistan; at the same time that he is relieved from all dread of the Persians, who are now distinctly affirmed not to have taken Herat, and not to be coming down on Candahar.

The Bombay Times states that the Auckland, the Nemesis and Atalanta, Steamers, sailed on Monday 9th instant from Bombay with a wing of the 5th Native Light Infantry and a company of Artillery to Surat, which will now have the protection of 1,000 troops and a strong police force.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 25.

The Rutovize Steamer has just returned from Moumein with the old Governor, after having deposited the new one. Major Broadfoot, who has been appointed to the important office of Governor-General's Agent for affairs beyond the Sutledge, the most important post, under existing circumstances, next to that of a Member of Council, proceeds to join his appointment.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 14.]

[VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 26.

We are happy to learn from the Englishman that Sir Thomas Turton, of whose recovery great fears have been entertained, was in a state of convalescence at Rouen on the 5th of August last. His medical advisers before his departure recommended constant change of air and scenery, and his wonderful recovery is to be attributed to his having followed their direction.

The number of letters and covers brought from Europe by the Sesostris steamer to Bombay on the 7th instant, does not exhibit any falling off as compared with former months. The number of letters was 34,835; of Newspapers 48,341,—total 83,176.

The news from the Punjab is warlike. The Royal troops have been ordered to resume their march on Jumboo to attack Golab Sing.

The attacks on peaceful citizens continue without abatement. The Hurkaru informs us that on Tuesday night the Sheriff's Dewan, was proceeding home with an office box containing Company's paper, notes and cash, to the extent of 10,000 Rs., and security papers of the value of two lakhs of Rupees, when a party of men, Europeans and East Indians, fell upon him. The Baboo appears to have resisted them manfully. He received three severe blows, but saved his treasure. After some trouble, he obtained the services of a Choukeedar, and one of the offenders was seized, but managed to get off.

The Hurkaru informs us that an order has actually passed Council for the payment of 50,000 Rupees towards the erection of the Gwalior cenotaph, a column of marble and bronze, which is to be erected on the banks of the river opposite the water gate of the Fort in a position from which it is most likely to be displaced by the incursions of the river.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 27.

A report has been going abroad that Mr. Stephenson is gone home as the agent of the Inland Steam Navigation Company, which we know to be a mistake. He may probably be asked to give his aid towards the construction of the boats of that Association, but his great object is the formation of a Company for the establishment of a Railroad from Calcutta to Mirzapore, which the late Deputy-Governor gave him reason to believe would receive the countenance of Government.

The Englishman, in reference to a quotation from his paper regarding the services of Capt. Barber—who by the bye was the person if we are not mistaken who advised, or openly approved of, the sending our Steamers to Bombay on their way to and from Suez—says, “of course our contemporary is quite able and willing to point out when and where we ever said what he here so coolly puts into our guileless mouth.”

When penning that notice, we had our eye on the following remark of the Englishman. “We say now, what we have already said in substance, that to no one individual are the Bengalees so much beholden for this consummation as they are to Capt Barber.”

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28.

The Delhi Gazette, has intelligence from Lahore to the 14th instant, devoid of any news of consequence besides the arrangements for the coming struggle between uncle and nephew for the Premiership of the Punjab.

The Hurkaru states that Mr. J. P. Grant, who returned to India last week on the Bentinch, is about to be deputed to Mysore on some commission for the settlement of affairs in that country.

Mr. Montrieu has retired from office at the Police; and it is said that his business has been divided among Mr. Robinson, Mr. Blacquiére and the Chief Magistrate; so that in all probability we shall in future have three Magistrates instead of four; and the public security will not be lessened or increased thereby. We are still behind Bombay. With a much larger amount of shipping, with property afloat, possibly to the value of more than a million sterling, we have no River Magistrate, whereas the sister Presidency has already been endowed with one.

We are happy to hear that Lord Ellenborough arrived safely at Aden on the 4th of September, thirty-four days after leaving Calcutta. His Lordship must have had a boisterous and unpleasant trip.

There have been some statements lately put forth in the papers implicating Rajah Kishnath Roy of Berhampore in the maltreatment of a Janadar. We now learn from the Englishman that the Raja was not present at the time, and that he altogether denies having been aware of it. For the truth or otherwise of these averments we must look to the disclosures at the trial. The Rajah has been admitted to heavy bail, himself in 50,000 Rs. and two sureties in a like sum, all of which has been deposited.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 30.

The Englishman of Saturday evening last informs us that the six mutineers of the 64th Native Infantry who were condemned to death, were executed at Sukkur, on the 11th instant. The troops paraded on the occasion were a wing of H. M. 13th Light Infantry, a Company of European Artillery, and the 4th and 64th Native Infantry. After the execution, these corps passed by the gallows in open columns of companies, and not a word escaped the lips of a single man. Had this just and necessary severity been inflicted in the end of February last, when the spirit of mutiny first broke out, and the men threatened, as the Englishman tells us, to shoot their officers, and go over to the Seikhs, the reputation of three or four other corps would have been saved.

The Madras Circulator states that H. M. Ship Samarang has been fired upon by a French vessel of war. As this must have occurred before that vessel reached Madras, and as she has been a month at that port where the insult would of course have been instantly reported, little credit can be attached to the story.

We beg to call the attention of our readers to an extract from the Delhi Gazette, respecting the district of Tirhoot, into which the success of Mr. Albert Robertson's plans for manufacturing Sugar from the cane instead of from goor, seems to have introduced a new stimulant to manufacturing enterprise. The writer affirms that Mr. Robertson's first Steamer will be plying on the Ganges on the first of August next. The sooner the better.

The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette states that the Steamer Carnac, which had been employed in conveying troops from Bombay to Surat, had returned from the latter place and reported that the city was in great commotion on the arrival of the troops; but that the people did not commit any violence. The Notification abolishing the tax on trades had been made public; the inhabitants were quiet, and had resumed their usual occupations. We learn also from one of the papers received this morning that Sir Keith Arbuthnot, who so injudiciously suspended the Salt Act, has himself been suspended.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 1.

A numerously signed requisition has been presented to the Sheriff of Calcutta to convene a meeting of the inhabitants for the purpose of expressing their sense of the important and successful military achievements of Sir George Pollock. The meeting will be held on Monday next the 7th instant, at four o'clock.

We regret to learn from the Star, on the authority of letters from Shikarpore, that the sickness at that post is terrific. Up to the present time we have been indulging the hope that the season would pass over in the country beyond the Indus without a return of sickness; but those hopes must now we fear be laid aside. Nearly 400 men of the 69th, nearly the entire regiment of the 7th Cavalry, and half the troop of Horse Artillery are in the Hospital. There are but two medical men present, and they are both ill. The troops are in a poor state to meet an attack of the Beloochees; only we believe that in a sickly season beyond the Indus, disease makes little distinction between the new comers and the aborigines, and proves equally fatal to British and Beloochee soldiers.

We rejoice to learn that the Governor-General continues to give his active countenance to the cause of public education. Sir Henry Hardinge has announced his intention to preside at the distribution of the Gold and Silver medal, the gift of Mr. Cameron to the students of Moral Philosophy, in the Hindoo College.

The Hurkaru states that the examination of candidates for Mobnsiffships, which was to have been held on the 1st of January next, has been postponed until Government can decide whether it should not be occasional. No examination was held in the beginning of the present year, in consequence of the serpentine abstraction of the Examination papers. We know that many have been labouring for two years to prepare themselves for the examination, who will suffer something more severe than disappointment if no opportunity should be offered them of obtaining an appointment.

The Bombay Courier states that the order for the cessation of certain taxes on trades and professions had been received with grateful feelings by the inhabitants of Surat. The remission of one half the increase of the Salt tax, our contemporary thinks, will improve the good feeling. We should have felt certain of this result if the new tax had continued to be collected, but, through the unwise conduct of Sir Keith Arbuthnot in suspending the tax, the four annas a maund now imposed as a modified tax will probably still be considered a grievance by those who have been led to expect its entire abolition.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 2.

The account which we gave yesterday from the Star of the great sickness which has begun to prevail at Shikarpore is unhappily confirmed by the Delhi Gazette received this morning. Forty, fifty, or sixty men go into hospital daily. It is a gloomy change.

Sickness has also made its appearance to an alarming extent among the troops at Delhi. Of 4,525, no fewer than 1,094, nearly one-fourth of the whole number in hospital. The number of convalescents is 202.

It appears from the Delhi Gazette, that the sum realized for the relief of the Gwalior Christians, amounts to 5,330-8. The list in the Englishman announces that the contributions to the Ellenborough testimonial have reached Rs. 38,773, that for Mrs. Dr. Sully, Rs. 2,717.

The latest accounts from Gwalior are to the effect that there is an anxiety on the part both of Golab Sing and his nephew Heera Sing to avoid a resort to arms and to reconcile differences. A second embassy of the chief men has been sent to Jumboo, to patch up the quarrel. We do not remember to have seen any account of the proximate occasion of the quarrel; its cause is easily understood by a reference to the principles of eastern policy. An uncle and a nephew, each of them with a large independent army and pecuniary resources, cannot long dwell in the same country without coming to blows.

The Star announces that Major H. Delafosse, C. B. of the Artillery, has been appointed Principal Commissary of Ordnance in the room of Col. Powney promoted.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 15.]

[Vol. VII.]

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 3.

The Delhi Gazette states that the well known merchant Budder-ood-deen of Bokhara had written to his correspondent at Cabool to say that a European of the name of Hatta, who is represented as having served in the Jan Buz Cavalry in Affghanistan, had arrived at Bokhara. It was reported some time back that a European officer of the name of Hart had proceeded to Affghanistan. There can be little doubt, therefore, of the identity of the individual. The savage ruler of Bokhara has two Europeans again in his clutches.

The new shareholders of the Delhi Bank are called on to pay up 25 per cent on their shares; so that business will commence without delay. The Capital has been increased to the extent of Two Lakhs of Rupees, to provide for those who were too late in their applications; but at a premium of six per cent., which will be carried to the credit of the concern.

Government has been graciously pleased to give rather a longer holiday than usual at the present Doorga-poojah. It is said to have been granted at the request of the Chamber of Commerce. May their shadow never grow less. A long holiday is a long and real blessing to those who have been immured in the metropolis, breathing an artificial and unwholesome atmosphere from month to month. The present vacation is to extend from Wednesday the 16th to Saturday the 26th, both days inclusive. It is in fact twelve days holiday.

Lieut. Col. Outram has resigned the very inferior appointment given him by Lord Ellenborough at Minawur, so unworthy of his acceptance, and taken his furlough to England. He has arrived at Bombay and is anxious to leave it by the next steamer.

A correspondent of the Hurkaru has well said, that in the annual relief we noticed yesterday, there is a singular allusion, which the Adjutant-General doubtless never intended. The destination of the 64th has not been fixed. This should have been said in so many words. Instead of which it is merely said, the 64th from Shukkur to—. Perhaps it may not be known at Head-Quarters that a long "dash," as the printer's call it, is always a substitute for a word which we must not print.

The Queen's 10th is to be removed from Calcutta, which will give no one any sorrow. The men and officers will be happy to quit the suffocating Fort, and the lieges in Calcutta will now be enabled to cross the plain without anxiety.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5.

The Gentleman's Gazette of Bombay, states, to our no small surprise, that the transit duties, &c., which Government has just relinquished at Bombay, amounted to two lakhs of Rupees, and that the tax substituted for them is calculated to produce seven lakhs; but he does not say whether this sum is likely to be the return of the modified duty of 12 annas, or of the original tax of 1 Rupee. This statement however is so totally at variance with that of the two other Bombay papers that we hesitate to receive it. In fact, we know not what to believe. The Courier and Times, state that the additional duty of Eight annas a maund on the Salt tax was calculated to yield seventeen lakhs a-year, whereas the repealed taxes were not of more value than one lakh.

The Englishman records an Act of the greatest barbarity on the part of some Native boatmen in Calcutta. A seaman had gone on board a dingee, to be taken to his ship. The boatmen, asked a Rupee; he gave them a four annas piece, all he had, and offered his jacket in pledge for the rest. They left the shore, but soon after attempted to put back, when he remonstrated, and they fell on him and beat him into the river, where he must have been drowned, but for the timely assistance of some men from another ship, who rescued him from a watery grave. Several boats, which were near and saw his struggles offered no assistance; among these was a Police boat. When is a River Magistrate to be appointed? The Englishman has not said whether the delinquents are in custody.

A meeting of the Assam Company, is to be held we see on the 30th proximo, when it is to be hoped a full disclosure will be made of all the frauds which have been practised on it; of the actual loss the Company has sustained by the almost incredible roguery to which it has been subject, and of the means which have been adopted to prevent future plunder, together with a faithful, honest statement of the present state and prospects of the Company. From all we have been able to learn, the mismanagement of this Association, before the present Committee took the business in hand, exceeds every thing that has been ever heard of in India before.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 7.

The Governor-General has intimated his intention of presenting a Cup value 1,000 Rupees to the races. Dwarkanath Tagore also presents a cup.

The holy city of Benares, though, according to Hindoo notions, it forms no part of our globe, has yet been visited by a swarm of locusts, which are said to have been "in number myriads innumerable." They came from a north-easterly direction, and went towards the south-west, making a sad havoc among the trees and green plants. Their flight lasted about twenty minutes. It is worthy of notice that the present year has been more remarkable for the repeated appearance of locusts in different districts, and at different times, than any year within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. The Star remarks, that a large flight passed over Calcutta some weeks ago, unnoticed by the Reporters, who it seems were not out star-gazing at the time.

The Shares of the Union Bank have nearly regained the place they once occupied in public estimation; they are at a premium of 200 Rupees. Bengal Bank Shares still stand at a premium of seventy-five per cent., though the report of its transactions gives in the papers exhibits a profit during the last month but little above the rate of seven and a half per cent. These facts testify to the redundancy of capital in India; which will in all probability become more and more distressing every day as the prospect of a war beyond the Sutlege dies out. The five per cents. are above ten per cent. premium, and the transfer five per cent., which has only ten years more to run, and which will probably be the first to be paid off, as the interest has to be remitted by Government to England, is actually above 20 per cent.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 8.

An advertisement was published from the Post office on the 5th rec cautioning the public against the use of wax in overland letters. It seems that many letters had reached England in a very mutilated state, owing to the use of the forbidden wax. If only the letters of the delinquents suffered, we should not care a straw about it, but unfortunately every such letter injures the letter of the innocent with which it comes in contact. It is scarcely fair to the obedient public to allow their letters to be ruined by the disobedient part of it. Government would not only be fully justified in peremptorily ordering every letter sealed with wax to be refused, but it can scarcely be said to act with strict justice to the community until this order is issued. Nothing short of it, we fear, will cure the evil.—After these remarks were written, we met with the Notice of the Bombay Post-Master-General dated the 25th September, which states that it is his intention in future to “separate the sealed letters from all others, and to pack them in Boxes, where they can only mutually work mischief to one another.” We wish our Post-Master-General would republish this Notice. We no longer care how many letters are sealed with wax, since the waxed letters are not to be injured by them. Those who persist in this objectionable practice, will now have the consolation of knowing that their letters will inevitably be injured, if not by the breaking of the seal, when it is found to adhere to some one else's letter, at least by the contagion of some other sealed letter.

The meeting held at the Town Hall yesterday afternoon to determine on the mode of welcoming Sir George Pollock was very fully attended by all classes. Mr. Rattray was in the Chair. The state of Sir George Pollock's health does not admit of his receiving an entertainment. It was resolved therefore to present him with an address, and to establish a Pollock Medal at Addiscombe by public subscription.

A case of singular and wanton cruelty is related in the Hurkaru of this morning, on the part of a Mr. Christopher Breary, an assistant in the Harbour Master's department. He was taken up from the Calcutta Bazar to Baboo's boat, in a public hawser boat. He perceived that one of the boatmen was sitting behind, instead of being at his oar. He was ordered to his place, and in passing Mr. Breary, that gentleman struck him, throttled him, and threw him on a hawser. The man was pulling slackly owing to a pin of the oar being wanting, and the gentleman went up to him, struck him and threw him overboard. The man at the adjoining oar spoke to Mr. Breary about what he had done when he was struck also and thrown into the water. The Markee now remonstrated, and he also shared the fate of the other two. The Magistrate convicted the delinquent of the assaults, and fined him 100 Rs. or two months' imprisonment. We hope the Superintendent of Marine will not fail to read over the report of the trial.

The little Steamer Windsor Castle which made some experimental trips up the river here a Hooghly some months back, and was subsequently purchased by Tharawaddy, has just returned to Calcutta. It is said his Majesty was wonderfully pleased with her, went frequently on board while she was at his capital, and has resolved to purchase another steamer. When we are told that a vessel with such a draft of water as the Windsor Castle, has found her way so easily up to Ava, we are strongly reminded of the superiority of the Irawaddy river to the Ganges for Steam Navigation.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 9.

We regret to learn from the Madras United Service Gazette, the sudden death, by apoplexy of Dr. Lane, the Private Secretary to the Governor, and one of the brightest ornaments of the Medical Service at that Presidency.

From the same paper we learn that the health of H. M. 29th at Ghazee pore has been deeply affected by fever. Four hundred men are in hospital, all fever cases. The men have been moving about, making short marches, in the neighbourhood, in the hope of shaking off the enemy, but without success.—Friend of India.

CALCUTTA; SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1844.

[VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 10.

The Agri-Horticultural Society held its monthly meeting yesterday, when it was mentioned that a subscription was about to be opened to liquidate the debt still due on the Metcalfe Hall, which amounts to twenty-two thousand Rupees. The Governor-General has put down his name for 500 Rs. and Sir Herbert Maddock for 200 Rs. It is very desirable that the debt should be wiped out; but it is rather unfortunate that this heavy subscription should come up at the time when we want all the resources of benevolence for the Fever Hospital.

More had beer! cries the Star, the guardian of public health. One Hundred and ten hogsheads of poison, under the name of undrinkable beer, were disposed of on Tuesday last, at from Rs. 2-8 to 3 Rs. a cask. The cask is worth 2 Rs., so that, as our contemporary remarks, 63 gallons of beer is purchased for eight annas or a Rupee. Who drinks it?

The Englishman states, on the authority of letters from Bundelkund, that the refractory chiefs are rapidly coming in, on the condition that we grant them a pardon for past offences, and they give us security for future obedience. Kummode Sing, the ex-Raja's uncle, has surrendered on these terms, and is now at Jhansi. Parcechut himself, the Jupiter Maximus of Bundelkund, is also on his way to that place. The surrender of these chiefs, combined with the influence we now exercise in the neighbouring district of the Gwalior state, which has long been the refuge of all turbulent spirits, will doubtless tend to tranquilize the country.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 11.

The Buffs are at length to quit India for old England. They were to embark at Allahabad on the 15th.

Singapore papers announce the capture of several forts and the destruction of many haunts of notorious pirates on the island of Borneo by H. M.'s ship Dido, Captain the Hon. Henry Koppel, and the Steamer Phlegethon, Captain Scott. It is to be hoped that the lesson these pirates have now received will keep the coast clear for some time.

All the letters from Sukkur concur in attributing the present healthiness of that post, which was a very Golgotha last year, to the extraordinary exertions made by General Hunter, in draining the place, and preventing the accumulation of stagnant water and filth. This shows how much may be done in a single twelvemonth to render a place salubrious by enlightened and persevering exertions.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12.

The Bombay Courier, in allusion to the progress of the troops sent against some refractory soldiers in the Kolapore state, gives an extract of a letter in which the expedition is called an "interesting tour," and states that up to the 25th September the artillery had been employed in throwing shells into the Fort, and that the Arabs made a brave resistance. For an account of the origin of this little war, in which many lives will doubtless be sacrificed, we would refer our readers to an able article in the Madras United Service Gazette of the 27th September, from which it would appear that these men are perhaps more sinned against than sinning.

The British India Society have addressed a letter to the Home Secretary of the Government of India in which they complain of the great increase of drunkenness in Calcutta within the last thirty years, and the great immorality which has resulted from it. To establish this fact, they mention that in addition to the shops where the sailors disgrace themselves, and the large wine and spirit depôts, there are ninety-two "gin palaces," each of which is enabled to pay a municipal tax of six Rupees a-day. They complain that the Magistrates have not the power of refusing to license shops, and that there is a want of vigilance in the Police. We fear this will be found one of the most difficult questions yet submitted to Sir Henry Hardinge, and that the moderation of inebriety in Calcutta will prove a more arduous task than the suppression of a mutiny. It would appear from this statement that the tax on spirituous liquors paid by the Natives of the City in the retail shops, amounts to about two lakhs of Rupees a-year, or about three Rupees a year for every male inhabitant who has attained years of maturity and discretion. Supposing the retail venders to make as much as they pay in the tax, the average consumption of liquor for every grown up male in Calcutta—supposing the Native ladies not to drink—is at the rate of Eight annas a-month.

The Englishman gives the gratifying intelligence from Shikarpore, that sickness was evidently on the wane on the 21th. Seventy-one of the black sheep of the 61th—the blackest have been hung—have been expelled the corps. Capt. Shortreed has been placed in command of it. But there is not as yet a syllable on the result of the Enquiry held on Col. Moseley in reference to the promises he held out to the men of the 64th.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 14.

The last Delhi Gazette contains the very gratifying intelligence that Dr. Wolff has been ordered to quit Bokhara in company with Mr. Hatta or Hart. It is given in a letter from Cabool, which states that with regard to the two Feringees, one of whom was named Hatta, and the other who had brought letters from the Sultan of Room, and who had come to claim Stodder Sahib, and Konly Sahib, they have also been ordered to leave the country. We hope Wolff will be enabled to take India in his way to England, were it only that the community may have an opportunity of testifying their admiration of his intrepid benevolence.

Some little time ago, we asked our contemporary at Agra to furnish us with some information regarding the facilities which had been created for expediting the conveyance of letters and passengers in the North West. Though we have immediately received some valuable information from a correspondent, yet we republish with thanks the particulars with which the Editor has furnished us. We are most happy to learn that Mr. Thomason is making arrangements for the establishment of a carriage post between Allahabad and Benares. The Mail between Calcutta and Burdwan is already conveyed in a vehicle drawn by horses. We have therefore only 384 miles from Burdwan to Benares, to provide for, in order to secure an uninterrupted communication between Calcutta and Cawnpore by Mail Coach.

The Delhi Gazette states, that a hint has been given to the Commander-in-Chief, to abandon that part of his Military tour which embraces Loodhiana and Ferozepore, for fear the Sikhs might take umbrage at it.—The Delhi Gazette adds, "that we should be obliged to write the word fear!" Why not write it? There is a salutary fear of imprudence, and there is a dastardly fear which deters a man from doing his duty. If it is not desirable that Government should plunge into war with the Sikhs, and if the presence of Sir Hugh Gough in the neighbourhood of the Sutlege is likely to precipitate hostilities, the fear which keeps him from that vicinity is the soundest political wisdom, and need not be an object of shame.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 15.

A letter from Moulmein, of the 21st September, published in this morning's Star, says, in allusion to the emigration of labourers from the opposite coast, that two or three hundred of them arrive on every vessel; that they are all deck passengers, provide themselves with food, and pay £10 for their passage; that they remain on the vessel until some one goes on board to engage them. He farther states, notwithstanding the arrival of labourers, wages keep high, and range from 8 to 10 Rupees a month; that 3000 emigrants come over annually, and that the number already in the settlements is 30,000. There must then have been a most astonishing increase of arrivals in the last four years; for in January, 1840, there were not more than 2,500 natives of India in the whole population. This is the last authentic account we have of this province. Our statistical information regarding it is now four years and more in arrears. Could not Government be prevailed on to suspend Lord Ellenborough's gagging order, at least in reference to the Settlements on this coast?

The Madras Spectator announces the death of Lieut.-Col. James Campbell of the 11th M. N. I., at Vizianagram on the 25th ultimo. He had retired to rest in apparently good health, but about 11 o'clock his servant heard a noise as of some person falling. He went in and found him on the floor. He had fallen down in a fit of apoplexy, and ceased to breathe about one in the morning.

Sir Charles Napier has published says, the Madras Spectator, another obnoxious Order, forbidding officers who visit Kurrachee on medical certificate to attend parades, mess-rooms, and places of public amusement, and threatening to cancel the medical leave of the parties in case of disobedience. His Excellency has evidently been reading over the Staniforth controversy, and has resolved to take a leaf out of Mr. Bird's book.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 16.

The Bombay papers give us the reply of the Bombay government to the 300 petitioners who begged that the new tax on Salt might be repealed; and that the burden of taxation might be taken off the shoulders of the poor and laid on those of the rich. The Governor cannot admit that the additional tax of four annas will bear heavily on the people at large, and he is satisfied that it will be more than compensated by the abolition of town and other duties. It is added that the duty of twelve annas has been adopted under the authority of the Court of Directors, and must be considered final.

The little affair of the two forts, in the Southern Mahratta country which the Arabs refused to give up, and in the defence of which they resolved to die, appears to assume somewhat of a serious aspect. It is rumoured that our troops have been baffled; and the Bombay papers received this morning, state, that reinforcements consisting of a Company of Sappers and Miners, a wing of H. M. 2d or Queen's Royals, and a squadron of the 14th Dragoons had been ordered off. Among the casualties, the most distressing is the loss of Lieut. Shakespear of the 2d Europeans, the nephew of Sir Richmond Shakespear, "a fine open, generous, high-minded soldier," who with his usual coolness had gone a few paces from under cover to assist a wounded sepoy with a doolie, when he was shot through the body; and the wound was considered mortal.

The Delhi Gazette just received has a letter from Bokhara with which the Editor has been furnished by a friend, which details all the particulars of Dr. Wolff's conversation with the Khan of Bokhara, about Stoddart and Conolly. It states that the Doctor actually demanded their bones, when he found that they had been executed, and said he could distinguish them from the bones of any other person; and that he has them now in a chest.

We are happy to learn that the sermon preached on Sunday last at the Cathedral by the Venerable Archdeacon, on behalf of the Fever Hospital produced more than a Thousand Rupees.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 47.]

[VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 17.

The left wing of P. M. 13th, the "illustrious garrison," embarked on Steamers at Sukkur for Kurrachee on the 4th of September; 450 men and 15 officers, without one man on the sick list. But owing to the extreme thinness of the awning, and the extreme heat of the sun, 38 men went into hospital when they disembarked at Kotree to continue their progress by land. Sickness increased to such an extent that Col. Vigors was obliged to halt at the fifth March, and send an express to the Governor for carriage for the sick, who had increased to 157, besides 80 men in the rear, weak and unable to march with arms. Such neglect deserves the severest reprobation. This noble corps, now about to return to old England after twenty-two years of service, may almost be said to have been twice renewed since it landed at Fort William in 1822. On reaching Kurrachee, the men "looked pale and were weakly in their ranks, but their very clean appearance, and perfection in appointments, struck all who saw it with admiration."

The Mullicks have done more harm than good by their offer to release the civil debtors confined by the Court of Requests. On the first day of the Poojah, the paltry sum of 1,416 Rs. was expended in the release of forty-eight debtors. But a report having been spread abroad that they intended to release all debtors, the jail has been crowded for days with candidates for admission, and no fewer than two hundred and fifty-three poor wretches have managed to get themselves incarcerated in the hope of being thus relieved of their obligation; of these, seventy-three are women. The whole of this body has been disappointed. All that the Mullicks have done therefore is to release 48, and incarcerate 253!

The Englishman states, on the authority of a correspondent, that the young Raja of Burdwan contemplates the establishment of a public Hospital for the poor of the district. He is the wealthiest landholder in Bengal, and may do it without feeling any sensible diminution of his resources. The writer says, this example of philanthropy set by the Burdwan Raja ought to be followed by the many wealthy Baboos of the land. Ought, most certainly, but will it? If the Calcutta Baboos would give to the Fever Hospital one-fifth of what they are this week expending on the follies of the Doorga Poojah, there would be no fear about its establishment.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 18.

We are happy to learn that Col. Outram has been appointed Commissioner by the Bombay Government to enquire into the political grievances of the Kholapore subjects, whom we are now coercing with our tremendous artillery. Why not allow them to fight it out with their oppressors? What a blessing to millions if we were to leave the states under our protection to manage with their own courage and resources the insurrections created by their own extortions and oppressions, and limit our interference to the advent of an external foe.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19.

The Brilliant, Capt. King, bound to Bombay with a valuable cargo on board, was totally lost on the edge of Sagur Sands on the 16th. She was, it appears, standing on towards the Sand, and from ten fathoms suddenly shoaled into seven, then into three and a half, and then struck. The Dwarkanath steamer, happening to be at hand, succeeded in rescuing the crew and a portion of the cargo before the vessel sunk to appear no more.

The notorious Alloo Paroo, who was seized the other day and brought up to Bombay has been tried, and at the end of three days found guilty, of the most nefarious fraud. The villains had it seems effected insurances upon goods purporting to be more valuable than they were, and insured valuable goods to a considerable amount, and then unshipped them just before the vessel left the port. The Captain was to carry out the scheme by burning the vessel in Singapore roads, which he effected in Oct. 1842. The chief conspirator has been sentenced to transportation for life, the second to ten years, and the third to the House of Correction. The Captain, who is beyond the reach of law, the reader will be happy to find has been defrauded of his share of the plunder by his accomplices. The vessel and cargo were insured for 7,50,000 Rs.

The following instance of noble conduct is given in the Englishman. "At about half-past eight o'clock last night, a midshipman of the ship Robert Small slipped overboard. The alarm was instantly given to the other vessels, but not a boat was available; the terrific screams of the youth struggling with death were appalling; every body appeared paralyzed as the tide carried him beyond our reach; but at length the third officer of the ship Queen of England, Mr. Coffee, nobly and fearlessly dashed into the stream, regardless of personal safety, seized and supported the expiring youth until they reached the life-buoy, thrown overboard for them which eventually saved them both, they being picked up by a dinghy afterwards."

MONDAY, OCTOBER 21.

The London Mail, which we have been expecting with some impatience for the last three days, arrived in Calcutta last night a little before midnight. It left London on the 7th September, and Suez on the 23d, having been only sixteen days between those two ports. The Cleopatra steamer, by which the Mail was conveyed to Bombay, is one of the old slow coaches, which are to be superseded by the three new vessels the Court of Directors is building for Bombay. Had the Mail been put on board the Hindostan or Bentinck at Suez, we should have received all our letters and our papers two or three days earlier.

By this opportunity we learn that Lord Ellenborough arrived at Suez on the 15th of September; reached Alexandria at 3 p. m. on the 19th, and intended to leave it the next morning in H. M.'s steamer, the Geuser which had been placed at his Lordship's disposal. He reached Aden on the 4th and inspected the works, and was invited to an entertainment by the Officers of H. M.'s 17th Regt. when his health was enthusiastically drunk. On returning thanks he repeated the sentiments he had promulgated here, that his disconnection from the army in India was a matter of the deepest regret, and stated his satisfaction that the last day he passed in the territories subject to the power of British India, should be in the company of one of the most distinguished Regiments in her Majesty's service.

The accounts from the seat of war in the Southern Mahratta Country are unpleasant. The little independent state of Kholapore, which has so repeatedly given us trouble, has been the occasion of bringing a large British army into the field to reduce the two forts of Samunghur and Bamunghur, the soldiers of which have been driven to revolt by oppression. Our army had been for some days seated before the former, which was found to be very strong and desperately defended. Our guns make no impression on the walls, and the place is so large that shells have produced no effect. In eleven days we had done nothing but silence one of their guns. In this time we have had two officers and nine men killed, and forty men wounded. One officer has also been carried off by cholera. Fresh troops are pouring from every direction, and there will be soon a larger army to avenge this contemptible quarrel, not our own, than we had at Hyderabad or Meaneer. Yet if we were to pension the imbecile creature on the throne, and take out of his minister's hands the means of oppression, and give the people a sound government, and cut off the necessity of sending 4,000 men against a fort within a hundred and fifty miles of Bombay, how would England ring with charges of rebellion and political villany!

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 22.

The Hurkaru states that Sawun Mull, the Dewan of Mooltan, died on the 20th of last month.

The Englishman states, on the authority of Bundelkund letters of the 22nd, that the ex-Raja of Jeypore was in the Therce district, and in safe keeping, though not actually in the hands of Col. Sleeman. We hope soon to hear of this last consummation.

We are happy to find it announced that Lady Emily Hardinge has taken her passage for India in the December Steamer. Lord Elphinstone and Sir Robert and Lady Sale, it is also stated, will come out by the same opportunity. Surely no one after this can object to the Steamers as a "low style of thing" as compared with the sailing vessels which double the Cape.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 23.

We are happy to learn that the swindler to whom we alluded some time ago as having taken in the people of Madras, has himself been taken up and will soon be brought to justice. It appears that he had gone on a professional tour to Pondicherry, where he contrived to disencumber the people of Eighteen Hundred Rupees. He is now on his way back to Madras in charge of the Police Peons whom Mr. Elliot sent to arrest him.

More Lanks—Bank upon Bank. The Delhi Gazette just received contains the notice of a meeting held at Simlah on Saturday the 12th instant, when it was resolved to establish a Bank with a Capital of Five Lakhs of Rupees, in 1,000 shares of 500 Rupees each. Its "interior economy and the principles of its working" are to be after the model of the Agra Bank. There are now, therefore, no fewer than four banks in the North West Provinces, all within two hundred miles of each other,—one at Agra the parent of them all, another at Mussourie, a third at Delhi, and the last at Simlah.

The Delhi Gazette confirms the information which was received in Calcutta yesterday, of the death of Sawun Mull, the viceroy of Mooltan, under the Sikh Government. He was the ablest native ruler in the North West; and only wanted the opportunity to establish an independent kingdom. The country entrusted to him, furnishes evidence, by its prosperity, of his wise and equitable administration. He fell by violence. A notorious criminal was summoned for investigation to his presence, and drawing forth a pistol from his bosom, shot him. The Dewan lingered for a considerable time, and at length died of the wound. His son has been confirmed in the Government. To have appointed another would have led to a civil war.

We learn from the Agra Ukhbar of the 16th, which came in early this morning, that Poreechut, the Ex-Raja of Jeypore, with all his partizans and followers are by this time at Jhansi. He gave himself up at Oorecha about the 9th. Thus the Robin Hood of Bundelkund has left the glades of the forest, and is now under the protection of the British Government. There is therefore an end to the insurrection—at least for some time to come. The arrangements made for the better administration of the province, the superior force stationed in it, and the subjugation of Gwalior, will give a long prospect of tranquillity to it.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 48.]

[VOL. VII.]

Y, OCTOBER 24.

The London Times of the 7th September states, that, though it is generally understood that the terms offered by the Peninsular Company have been accepted, and that the conveyance will commence with the 1st of January, yet there is no official notification of the fact, and that no contract has been actually signed. It appears singular that two months should have been allowed to elapse without the official announcement of an arrangement which was most confidently asserted to have been completed.

The Star mentions that a house in China wrote to its correspondents in London for £140 worth of Snalts; but the London merchant, having never heard of such an article, sent out Sardines! It was required to assist the Chinese in painting their earthen ware. In England it is used for giving that fine bloom which some foolscap and letter papers possess.

Sir Claude Martin Wade has retired from the East India Company's Service on the pension of a Colonel, after thirty-five years' service. He is well known as the Captain Wade, who so long managed our negotiations with the Sikhs, and who was removed to Indore because of the unconquerable aversion manifested by the Lahore Durbar to him. He was the first British Officer who ever forced the Khyber pass, which all previous Mahomedan Generals had been obliged to open by bribery.

The General Orders of the 18th give effect to the recent resolution of the Court of Directors relative to the batta to be allotted to the troops who served in China. Those who were engaged in the whole of the operations, beginning with the 21st August, 1841, and terminating with the 29th August, 1842, will receive twelve months' batta; those who served only in the Yang-tse-Kiang, six months batta. In this latter category is included, we fear, the Bengal Volunteers who did not leave India till the beginning of 1842. It seems hard that while those who were present only at the capture of Canton were rewarded with twelve months' batta, the same recompense should not be given to those employed in the more arduous operations on the Yang.

The Madras Spectator is offended at the idea of Mr. J. P. Grant's being appointed Special Commissioner at Mysore, to the supersession of all the Madras Officers, Civil and Military. What the nature of his duties are to be, has not transpired; but our contemporary will find a long established precedent in the employment of Bengal Civilians as Commissioners in reference to the debts of the Carnatic Nabob.

The Lahore correspondent of the Hurkaru has given, from a paper said to have been recently read by Heera Singh to the Chiefs, a catalogue of the various grievances of which the Young Minister complains, and which are apparently the cause of the present hostile movement against Golab Singh. The question however is simply in whose hands shall the real power of the Punjab reside, in that of the uncle or the nephew?

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 25.

The Englishman said some time since that the Adjutant-General of the army was entirely free from all blame in having written the fatal letter to Col. Moseley granting every indulgence to the sepoys, inasmuch as his share in the transaction was simply ministerial, and as he had remonstrated against it. The Delhi Gazette says he has heard something of a communication from the then Governor-General received by the Commander-in-Chief on the day on which the much talked of letter was written, which would go very far to exonerate even Sir Hugh Gough from much of the blame which now attaches to him, and to fix it on a higher personage. The Editor of the Englishman on this says, that he knows the nature and the history of the communication to which the Delhi Gazette alludes, and that in his opinion it was not of a character at all to warrant the Commander-in-Chief's writing in the positive and official manner that he did on the occasion to Lieut.-Colonel Moseley. We wish the Englishman had given us some insight into the "nature and history" of that letter of Lord Ellenborough, as his own subsequent observations are calculated to leave on the mind the impression that these concessions were positively authorized by the highest authority in the country. It seems we have more to learn on this mysterious and unfortunate affair than we had supposed.

Capt. Souter who saved the colors of H. M. 44th, which was annihilated at Cabool, has, we find, arrived at Bombay, having exchanged into H. M. 22d.

The Bombay papers mention the death of Lt. Colonel Stratford Powell. This gallant officer breathed his last at sea on the 13th ultimo, on the Berenice steamer in the Red Sea. He was lately the Adjutant-General of the Bombay Army.

Another of the Mutineers of the 64th has been tried, found guilty, and hung.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26.

The Bombay papers announce the total loss of the ship Ceylon. She left London on the 4th of June, with a cargo of 300 tons of coal and 40 tons of copper. On the 1st of October she struck on a coral reef off the Laccadives, of which nothing was visible but two small patches. On the 3d, all hope of saving the ship being lost, the Captain and crew abandoned her and arrived at Bombay on the 12th, after having endured much privation, occasioned by boisterous weather and the absence of any shelter from the sun.

The Star has published full and particular details of the receipts and expenditure of the Metcalfe Hall, for which, unfortunately, we cannot make room. The main facts are these: The original estimate was 48,921 Rs. and the sum in hand at the time the estimate was approved of was within 1,092 Rs. of that amount. But the plan was subsequently, and, as it appears, repeatedly, altered, and the building has cost 65,163 Rs. This statement of accounts is not so clear as we could wish. The actual cost of the building has exceeded the sum which was originally in hand to pay for it by Rs. 46,335, and we cannot therefore account for the additional sum of nearly 4,000 Rs. now required. The iron roof has cost 5,400 Rs.; a wooden roof would have cost 8,000 Rs. The experience which has been gained since this roof was sanctioned, indicates that it might be done for less than half that sum; and this simply by reducing the thickness of the iron plates. In the Metcalfe Hall they are we believe $\frac{3}{4}$ of an inch thick. In the Mission Chapel at Serampore, they are only $\frac{1}{2}$ of an inch. This lighter roof will probably stand fifty, perhaps a hundred years, with a little care. No public building ought in future to be covered by any but an iron roof. It is far cheaper, and much more durable, requires no repairs, and sets our perpetual foes, the white ants, at defiance.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 28.

The Star of this morning has an interesting and important article on the state of the Oude Government which appears to have suddenly assumed an attitude of defiance towards the paramount power in India, which is superlatively ridiculous. Lord Ellenborough appears to have written a letter to the King extolling the administration of the Minister, Ahmed Alee Khan, but no sooner was his Lordship's face turned towards England than the Minister was ejected, and another appointed, against the remonstrance of the Resident, Sir George Pollock. Sir Henry Hardinge, on assuming the Government, wrote to his Majesty to apprise him of the disordered state of the Government, and to assure him that unless a remedy was applied to these disorders, he should be obliged to take measures which would not be very agreeable. To this letter it is said the King has sent a reply, which breathes a haughty tone of independence. Of course he must be constrained to eat his own words, or to retract them, for the office of Resident at his Court will soon be exchanged for that of Commissioner of the conquered districts of Oude.

The Assam Steamer left Allahabad for Calcutta on the 19th, and took in 313 chests of Indigo at Monghyr. This affords encouragement to the project now about to be pushed with vigor, of covering this line of navigation with Steamers. Nothing is wanting but the certainty of a return cargo to ensure a good commercial return for the capital embarked on this scheme, and to give it permanency. The Government vessels, supported by the funds of the state, could not have been expected to look out for business on their way down; they depended for a return almost exclusively on the upward cargo.

The number of cases on the Calendar of the present Sessions is twenty-two.

The number of Covers received at Bombay by the last Mail from England amounted to 83,947, namely 33,123 letters and 49,924 newspapers.

The number sent from this country in the previous month was, 47,534, viz. letters 38,277, papers 9,257, so that the number of newspapers we receive is five times that we send, which may give some idea of the relative difference of interest felt in England on Indian affairs, and in India on English politics.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29.

The Bombay papers state that the Fort of Samungud has surrendered. The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette states that a breach was effected in the fortifications, and that when the defenders saw that preparations were making to storm the place, they evacuated it, and that the besiegers on entering found it desolate, with nothing but walls and guns. The besieged as they passed through the country, after quitting the fort, plundered every village in their way, and it was apprehended they would occupy the almost impregnable fortress of Punalla, a few miles north of Kholapore, from whence it may cost a long siege to dislodge them. The whole country around is in a state of great commotion. This fort, it will be remembered, was garrisoned by our troops when the treaty of 1827 was signed, but was given up by the Governor of Bombay when he visited Kholapore in 1829.

The Englishman of this morning confirms the report that ten of the mutineers of the 64th, who were proceeding to Kurrachee, under the escort of H. M. 13th, have made their escape, and that Col. Squire has offered a reward of 50 Rupees a-head for their apprehension.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 19.]

[Vol. VII.]

correspondent of the Calcutta Star has addressed him on the very slow pace—scarcely faster than a snail's gallop—at which our bangy parcels are conveyed. For the benefit of our English readers we would explain that the bangy means the conveyance of parcels by the public post. These parcels are charged by the weight and are conveyed in light palankeens corresponding in size and shape, but not in weight, with those used by passengers. The palankeen with a passenger reaches Allahabad from Calcutta in six days, the Bangy palankeen scarcely under twenty, because only four bearers are appointed to the latter and eight or twelve to the former. The question therefore is, whether a full Bangy palankeen pays as much to Government as a palankeen with a passenger. A passenger has his dawk laid between these two places for 250 Rs. The charge for parcels to Allahabad from the Capital is 7 Rs. 8 As. for 400 tolaish or 5 seers or Sixty Rupees a maund. A Bangy palankeen with four maunds and seven seers would yield 250 Rs. If, then, the weight of a moderate sized passenger, between General Tom Thumb and Daniel Lambert, together with his bedding and the baggage he takes with him, does not exceed four maunds, the bangy might be conveyed as fast as the traveller—by having the same complement of bearers.

The Madras Spectator gives us a very theatrical representation of a very tragic event. A young French Civilian appointed to Pondicherry conceived himself insulted by the second officer of the ship in which he came out. The day before the anchoring of the vessel, he rushed into the cabin of the offender and repeatedly plunged a poignard into him. He was on his arrival placed in confinement, and hung himself to the roof of the room by his own cravat. It was a very shocking event, but it is rendered almost ludicrous by the affectation of the narrator.

A correspondent of the Englishman has been amusing himself and the Editor with a proposal to offer a regard of £50 for the most elegant design to be drawn for the Committee of the Ellenborough testimonial. He has himself sketched such a design, as if he were desirous of sharing the prize; but in very bad taste, for he recommends a Plateau with four elephants, one at each corner or angle. He surely can be no friend who would thus endeavor to perpetuate the association of Elephants, wild or tame, with the name of Ellenborough. Besides, the idea is not original. The late James Calder, in some humorous verses he penned, when he had leisure for mirth before the adversity of the firm began, described Government House in Calcutta as resembling "four elephants tied by the tails."

The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette affirms that the Bengal Government is about to transfer the

The Ex-Rajah of Jeitpore, has been brought in by Muzboot Singh, with all his followers,

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 1.

The Delhi Gazette states that on the 22d, that city was visited by an immense flight of locusts, which continued passing over for three hours. Myriads lighted on the trees, and might be heard devouring the leaves. This may emphatically be called the year of locusts.

The Star mentions that the Raja Krishnu Nath Roy put an end to his existence yesterday by blowing his brains out. The native who was tortured in his house in the country, and as it was said with his knowledge—though this he solemnly denied—having died, a warrant was issued from Berhampore for his apprehension; and the fear of disgrace induced the young man to shorten his days. He discharged one of the barrels of a loaded gun through his head, and expired immediately.

Farther particulars have now been received of the capture of the fort of Samunghur in the Southern Mahratta country. In storming the breach and effecting an entry, one sepoy was killed and several Europeans wounded. The enemy must have suffered severely; seventy-five dead bodies were counted within the fort, poor, wretched, ill-fed, ill-clothed creatures. Two hundred made their escape and were pursued. A large body of insurgents were coming up to reinforce the garrison at the time it fell, and the 5th Madras Cavalry was sent after them, and sabred more than two hundred, and made a hundred and fifty prisoners.

Major-General Simpson has arrived at Dinapore, and relieved Major-General Cartwright, who is again appointed to the Presidency Division.

SATURDAY NOVEMBER 2.

The accounts from the Southern Mahratta country, that is from the principality of Indrapore, subsequent to the capture of Samunghur are by no means satisfactory. The country seems to have been thrown into a state of the most complete disorganization by the misrule of the Brahmin ministers employed in the administration. The chief delinquent is said to be in the hands of the insurgents, who have loaded him with chains. The Aunt of the minor, who was one of the victims of the Premier, is described as giving encouragement to them. The troops of the state to the number of a thousand have joined the enemy, who are said to threaten our own military station of Belgaum. Five hundred lives have been sacrificed, and the utmost misery inflicted on the country by the misconduct and extortions of the native administration. Thus, when the official harpies have roused the people to the madness of rebellion, we step in and subdue them, and then restore the country to another native administration to run the same circle of extortion, and create another necessity for the interposition of our troops.

We are delighted to learn from the Englishman that the Governor-General is giving the most earnest attention to the improvement of the great public roads at this Presidency, and that the Benares road will soon be so well bridged as to admit of a carriage post. This has long been wanted, and the absence of it, eighty-eight years after the battle of Plassey reflects no honor on our Government. When a Mail cart or carriage has been laid on the road between Burdwan and Benares, we may hope that the post communication between Calcutta and Delhi will not occupy more than five days.

Our readers are aware that Tharavaddy sent round money to bribe the underlings in the office of the Political Secretary; and that he obtained copies of the despatches sent to the Resident at his Court as early as the Resident himself. It is also well known that an active Secretary swept the office clean of all who were implicated in this infidelity. A similar case has just turned up again. A very unpalatable letter was lately sent to the Resident at Lucknow, to be communicated to the King of Oude, but it was discovered that the King was fully aware of its contents before they were officially made known to him. Mr. Currie, the Foreign Secretary, when apprized of the fact, felt certain that the information had been purloined from his office, and it appears that sufficient evidence of the treachery of the head native functionary has been obtained to justify his removal from office.

TUESDAY NOVEMBER 5.

The Englishman states, on the authority of a letter from Shukkur of the 10th, that Sir Charles Napier had written to say, that unless Major Phillips, whom he so severely wipped a few days back, was brought to a Court Martial, and the 78th Highlanders allowed to remain in Scinde, he desired to be relieved of his command. This is, however, mere rumour, and we think unfounded rumour. It seems very improbable that so strict a disciplinarian as Sir Charles Napier should employ that dictatorial tone towards his superiors, which he would never for a second tolerate in his subordinates.

The Hurkaru's Afghanistan newswriter informs him, that Meer Ufzul had been despatched to collect revenue in the Zoormut valley; and that one of the chiefs having refused to pay his quota, with the usual message "come and take it if you can," the troops were sent, who in three days razed his forts and plundered his property. The reader will scarcely fail to remember, that it was to this valley our last expedition was sent, with Major Macgregor as the "Political," before the great insurrection broke out.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6.

We have no room left us for news; and there happens to be none, except that the whole of the Kolapore territory is said to be in a state of insurrection. This intelligence is given in the Hurkaru on the authority of a letter from Bombay.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 20.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1844.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 7.

The latest accounts from the Punjab give us every reason to believe that, for the present at least, there will be no war between Heera Sing and Golab Sing, the nephew and the uncle, notwithstanding the mighty preparations which have been made and the great bluster of the belligerents. The Dusserah has passed off without any commotion, and there is every prospect of tranquillity. Yet with so many elements of discord in the country, and two equally balanced powers holding authority in it, it is impossible to calculate upon the continuance of this repose with any confidence.

The increase of Banks in the North West has led to the increase of strife. The Mussourie Bank has just emerged from its chrysalis state, and appears in new strength and beauty under the more imposing title of the North West Bank of India. One "Calculator," has been publishing a letter on the comparative advantages of the three Mofussil Banks, a very gunpowder subject; and the North West Bank of India has taken fire and threatens the Agra Ukkhar with an indictment for libel. We think in nine instances out of ten these prosecutions are as foolish as they are useless. In the present instance, it cannot, if it terminate in favour of the Bank, greatly benefit its credit. But we do long to see a libel case tried in the Mofussil Courts, and to hear the learned arguments of the Native Vakeels upon the Law of Libel. There would be something new and racy in it.

Daniel Dickson and John Luckton, the men charged with assauling Major Wood, were yesterday tried and found guilty, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment with hard labour in the House of Correction.

The Coroner's inquest on the late Rajah Kishnath Roy terminated yesterday by finding a verdict of Felo de se. We believe according to English law such a verdict carries with it the forfeiture of the personal estate to the Crown. The Will, will of course, be the subject of dispute, and probably revive the days of 'fat suits.' The widow is said to be "in that state which ladies like, who love their lords," and the infant will of course be a male, and then the Will and the College may be given to the winds.

The gallant Bunderkund Legion passed through Agra on the 29th of last month in the highest trim and glee.

One Mr. Charles George Page, who has long been known in the suburbs of Calcutta, has been at length tried for fraud and embezzlement in the Court of the 24-Pergunnahs, and sentenced to a fine of 50 Rs. and six months' imprisonment.

The examinations of Braithwaite, the Master of the ship Neptune have terminated at the Bombay Police office in his full conviction. A case of greater brutality has seldom, if ever, been brought to public view. It is difficult to find terms in which to characterize the atrocity of this fiend in human form. We are sure that every one who peruses the details will be surprised and annoyed to find that the punishment—all the Court could inflict—was only a fine of one hundred Rupees. A second charge has been brought against him of having seized a French lad, and stripped him stark naked and then tied him up against the mizen rigging by his wrists and spread out on all fours, and caused him to receive the incredible number of two hundred and ten stripes. The Captain has been bound in heavy securities to make his appearance at the Sessions. If the charge is substantiated, it is to be hoped that the wretch will be banished for life to Norfolk Island.

The subject of the grants made in the Soonderbuns has been for several months under the consideration of Government; and the last Calcutta Gazette informs us that the Sudder Board has been authorized to enlarge the rent-free tenure to the extent of ten years, to all grantees who may appear to have exerted themselves to fulfil the conditions of the agreement, but have been prevented doing so by uncontrollable circumstances.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 8.

To the surprise of the officers in the Southern Mahratta Country, Colonel Outram galloped into the Camp with a commission in his pocket to take charge of the administration of the disturbed districts. This has displaced Mr. Reeves the Civilian, who goes home, as usual. Colonel Outram, it is said, is deputed on a mission of conciliation; but the permanent effect of any system of conciliation not founded on reform is much to be doubted. This is the fourth time our troops have been called to march into this petty state within the last twenty years, and our object should be to obviate the necessity of a fifth expedition.

The Englishman is very anxious to know how a Civil servant, who is a judge and Magistrate, can manage to elude the grasp of a hustler who is sent to bring him down from the interior of the country against his will. We think that if our Contemporary were to advertize for information he would obtain knowledge of a dozen funny contrivances by which gentlemen in the Mofussil gain credit by baffling the constable. We almost think we could furnish him with two or three ourselves, if we had time to rub up our memory. The boldest stroke for personal liberty was that of Mr.—, who has long been beyond reach of the Supreme Court writs, having paid all his debts by paying the common debt of nature. He seized the bailiff six hundred miles from Calcutta as a deserter, and sent him down under charge of a body of burkundazes to the Officer commanding the Fort, saying that as the man could not give a satisfactory account of himself, he had no doubt of his having deserted from H. M.—Regiment, to which he now returned him.

We regret to find it stated in the papers that Mr. W. Moore, the Deputy Post Master, on whose the main responsibilities of this most important office have devolved, amidst the perpetual changes in the Post-Master-Generalship which have been witnessed during the last ten years, is going home. The Press which has benefitted from his unremitting and successful exertions to accommodate it by the speedy and punctual delivery of its papers, has not been ungrateful on this occasion. We hope, if Mr. Moore does go, that he will not be allowed to depart without some token of public esteem. Government ought also to lay an embargo on him till he has initiated some able person in the mysteries of the office.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9.

The statement which we made some time ago that the Agra Bank was about to make Calcutta its Head Quarters is now confirmed in the Star. It is doubtless a false move. While the Bengal Bank has nearly a crore of Rupees unemployed in its vaults, as the last report told us, there is not room for another institution. It should have kept to the locality in which it was born and has grown up to vigorous manhood.

We have scarcely recovered from our surprise on hearing that a notorious dacoit in the neighbourhood of Agra, has assassinated a British Officer, than we learn that the gang of Rangoosie Bangria have entered the district of Candeish, and are committing dreadful depredations in the villages, and that a detachment of Native Infantry and 200 Irregular Cavalry are held in readiness to march against them as soon as their locality is known. What would be the state of India, two years after the dread and control of British arms was removed?

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 11.

A half-yearly meeting of the Steam Tug Association was held on the 8th instant, Mr. P. O'Hanlon in the Chair. The report was very satisfactory. The Association has now four Steamers, all in good working order and in constant employ. The Advocate-General has intimated the intention of Government to comply with the memorial for a Charter. A dividend of 10 per cent was declared, and the Chairman thanked for his able services in the chair. We shall shortly have a little competition in this line, as two other powerful Tugs are immediately expected, which will naturally contribute to reduce prices.

There is no intelligence of particular interest from the Southern Mahratta country. Only, the accounts are so contradictory that it is scarcely possible to reach the truth. One letter throws the blame of this insurrection on the Rajah's native minister; another on the unreasonableness of the insurgents. The public dispatches laud all the military arrangements; private letters hold them up to contempt. They state that there was no one even to point out where the Fort was situated to the detachment sent to take it; that on their arrival, the gate or gates were open, and the troops might have entered at once, but the Commanding Officer said his men were tired; that little use was made of the artillery brought at first, which might have answered; that when the great guns arrived, they were employed in an attempt to breach the strongest part of the fort, and that the discovery of the weak point was made by accident; that the guns were pointed at a post, which was mistaken for a man's head; and that three or four shots shewed how easily a breach might be made. The slaughter of the unresisting creatures in the fort was revolting. More than six hundred have perished by the sword.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 12.

The Englishman publishes a letter from Tirhoot of the 1st instant, which says, "The young Otaheite cane crop is coming up very well, and from the extensive plantations this year, great things in sugar may be expected." We are delighted to find that the great success which attended the cultivation of this cane and the manufacture of sugar in the Tirhoot district last year, has encouraged the extension of the cultivation, and the manufacture of it on more scientific and more economical principles. If this article can be generally produced even at double the price which the first experiment cost the home Government may fold up the question, of sugar duties. We shall then be able to supply to their fullest extent the saccharine wants of our fellow subjects in England, and at a price which no slaveholder can offer to sell at.

A Correspondent of the Christian Herald of the 5th instant gave the following information:—"We understand instructions have been given to all Magistrates of districts to make enquiries within their jurisdictions as to the number and condition of all relics of idolatry and Islamism, the Hindoo and Moslem temples which may have been abandoned and suffered to fall into decay, that measure may be devised for their repair and restoration at the expense of the state! The natives, however, are to be warned that the restoration of the temples, &c. is not to be construed into a sanction by the head of the Government of the idolatrous worship of the land, but merely with a view that the temples might be preserved to future generations as memorials of the former existence of such things. The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette throws some light on this order. Our contemporary says, that at the request of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain, the Court of Directors had instructed Government to use every possible precautionary measures to prevent further dilapidations or injury to the cave temples of India." Similar orders have doubtless been issued at this Presidency. The order seems to us to be very commendable, more especially as it is to be accompanied by the assurance, that it is not to be construed into a sanction by the head of the Government, of the idolatrous worship of the land. The misfortune is that it comes so late, after some of the noblest monuments of Hindoo and Mahomedan antiquity have perished under the hand of time and of the pilferer. We hope the Bengal Government will begin with the noblest edifice in the Lower Provinces, the tomb of Shere Shah, at Sasseram.—Friend of India.

[Vo L. VII.]

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 14.

In consequence of the long and faithful services of Sheik Abeedoulla, the Principal Sudder Ameen of Chittagong, Government has allowed him to retire on the pension of his rank and has conferred on him a Kilat, and allowed him to retain the title of Bahadoor. This is the individual whom a former judge of that station declared to be the only honest native whose character was altogether without stain; but there are doubtless many more such in the service, and the distinction now conferred on him will, we hope, serve as a stimulus to honorable exertion.

The latest news from across the Sutledge extinguishes all hopes of a campaign, and stars, and ribbons, and a Lahore Testimonial, at least for the present. After a great deal of bluster, the uncle and nephew appear to have accommodated their differences. Golab Sing of Jumboo is possibly stronger in men and resources than the regular Government, but the young Minister, who assumed the reins in the Punjab, at the same age at which William Pitt became Premier, has exhibited no ordinary talent in his difficult and precarious situation. That he has kept his seat with all the elements of a revolution boiling and bubbling around him in every direction, is a proof of singular talent.

The latest accounts from Mynpoorie give reason to fear that the murderer of Capt. Alcock has succeeded in making his escape into the Oude territory, where in the present refractory temper of the king, he may probably be allowed to lurk for some time. The commissioner has added 500 Rupees to the reward offered by the state for his apprehension. A reward of 5,500 Rupees ought to be enough to make the country too hot for him.

The number of covers sent from Bombay by the last Overland Mail on the 1st of November was 46,751,—viz. 35,733 letters and 1,040 newspapers. The Calcutta regular post of the 24th was in time for the Steamer, having made the trip in less than eight days. This is the first time in which the post, sent two days after the express, arrived in time to go with it.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 15.

The Bombay Courier states that authentic information has been received from Persia that the adventurous Dr. Wolff had been released by the Khan of Bokhara, and that at the date of the letter, he was safe in Persia. That paper adds that there are some well informed people—he might have added, and who are fond of a little detraction—who do not think that he was ever in any danger, and that he might at any time have retraced his steps.

Mr. Bushby, the Secretary of the Home Department of the Government of India, who has been on sick certificate to the Cape, has just returned to Calcutta, and the Star of this morning states that he is to be attached to the Sudder Court and that Mr. Davidson will, from “acting,” become “full” Secretary; but our contemporary must have been misinformed. Mr. Bushby’s judicial experience, was only of ten months’ duration, and for the last twenty-three years he has been employed in duties of another class.

• MONDAY, NOVEMBER 18.

The proceedings of the Court Martial held on the mutinous sepoy and Native officers of the 6th Madras Cavalry, which became insubordinate at Jubbulpore, have been published in the Madras papers, together with the very judicious remarks of the Marquis of Tweeddale. Of the mutineers, only the two who administered oaths to the sepoy and officers, have been sentenced to death; all the others have been either discharged from the Regiment or subjected to minor punishment.

The following are the statistics of the last Sessions. The number of persons committed was 39; of these, five were discharged by the Grand Jury, eighteen were convicted, and sixteen found not guilty.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19.

The latest accounts from Shikarpore state that sickness was very much on the decline there, and that there had been no farther casualties among the European officers. The other stations in this much dreaded country have been singularly free from disease. The sickness in H. M. 13th arose from their injudicious march at a most unfavourable season of the year, without any apparent necessity.

The following account of the surrender of the last of a gang of desperate dacoits, who have long infested the country, will be read with much interest:—

“We learn from Oude that the remnants of the Terrace Budduck dacoit gangs, comprising one hundred men, capable of carrying arms, and three times that number of women and children, surrendered themselves to Captain Ludlow, of the Thuggee and Dacoitee Department at Goruckpore, in the early part of September last. The three celebrated Chiefs, Dollis, Inderjeet, and Butchraj, after years of successful rapine, hemmed in on all sides, and driven to the last straights of privation by the vigilance of the department employed against them, have thus been induced to throw themselves on the mercy of the Government, who will, it is to be hoped, put these hereditary lawbreakers in a way to gain an honest livelihood.”

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 20.

The Report of the half yearly meeting of the Bonded Warehouse Association appears in this morning’s papers. It has now, we hope, reached the lowest point of depression; it cannot be that things must be worse before they are better. "The year which has elapsed is the least productive which has yet occurred." The dividend voted is only Five Rupees a share, or at the rate of less than three per cent. But when the new range of Counting Houses is completed it is expected that the affairs of this Association will begin to look up, and that profits will be at the rate of 8 per cent. These anticipations are not groundless. The tendency of things in Calcutta is to the establishment of an order of mercantile firms, the partners of which, while making their fortunes, will lodge at Spence's on 200 Rs, a month; and hire one of the counting houses of the Bonded Warehouse, and place all their consignments under its lock and key.

The Madras papers received this morning state that the two mutineers of the 6th Madras Cavalry condemned to death, were shot by musketry in the presence of all the troops at Arcot under the directions of Major-General Sir E. Williams.

Gwalior does not appear to be in a very tranquil state. Pertaub Sing, a notorious robber, has collected a body of three thousand men round his standard, and is committing great devastation in the districts of Kutcheori, Ghaur, Bhind, and others, and has threatened to make a night attack on the Gwalior Residency. The place of his retreat is said to be in a space of 24 miles, amidst forests, ravines, and nullas difficult of access. The people who compose his tail, are supposed to belong to the disbanded forces; and his strength will increase in numbers and boldness if he is not immediately put down. A large force has been sent against him, and a reward of 5,000 Rupees offered for his apprehension. "There is every hope," says a correspondent of the Agra Akbar, "that through the vigilance and foresight of the able Assistant Resident, Sir Richmond Shakespear, whose time and labors are most zealously devoted to the good of both Governments, and the tranquility of the country and its inhabitants, that this famous and powerful dacoit will speedily be arrested, and obtain the just reward of his deeds."—Friend of India.

ARRIVAL OF THE OVERLAND MAIL.

Times Office, 12th Nov., 1 p. m.

The H. C. Steamer Berenide, Lieut. Johnston commanding, came into harbour this day at noon, bringing the London Mail of the 7th Oct. She left Suez on the 23d at 3-50 p. m., arrived at Aden on the 31st ultimo at about 11 p. m., left Aden on the 1st instant at 8 p. m.

Sir Albert and Lady Sale proceed to India by the Overland route, in December next, accompanied by their daughter, Mrs. Sturt. The heroine of Jellalabad has been entertained within the last few weeks in Ireland, by the Corporation of Londonderry and the United Service Club of Dublin; and in this country by the Goldsmiths' Company, and the Corporation of Liverpool.

It is a matter of general regret, that the very delicate state of Sir William Nott's health should continue such as to preclude the possibility of some public entertainments, at which his presence was desired. The gallant officer has returned to Wales.

Mohán Lal, the faithful Moonshee of the late lamented Sir A. Burnes, has left London for Montrose, to deliver into the hands of the venerable father of that gallant officer the MSS. and private papers of his son.

It is expected that Prince Herry of Holland will proceed from Egypt via Bombay to China, on a diplomatic mission.

From and after the 31st Oct. the interest on India Bonds is to be reduced from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per cent. per annum, and persons declining to accept this rate are liable to be paid off.

The Prince of Surat has left this country for India by the Oriental. He expresses himself delighted with the kind reception given to him by his Royal Highness Prince Albert and the Nobility, and others in whose society he moved. Our public institutions do not escape his praise. The Society of Arts especially attracted his attention.

Lady Hayter does without hope of recovery in India.

We are informed that Messrs. Waghorn & Co. have established a branch agency at Poona for facilitating the despatch of Parcels addressed to Sholapore, Ahmedabad, Nassic, and other stations in the N. W. Provinces, which will open a more speedy and a cheaper conveyance than at present exists.

The King, Queen, Princess Adelaide, and Duke de Montpensier have left the palace of St. Cloud, for Eu. The Duke de Nemours, Prince de Joinville, and the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, with their respective princesses, are to reside at St. Cloud during the absence of the Majesties.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

[No. 22.]

[VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 21.

Col. Outram has been superseded in the Commissionership of the Kholapore country. The fact is announced in the Englishman of this morning. The reasons which we have heard for this removal, are such as fully to justify Government in the step which it has been constrained to take. The course which the Colonel has pursued since he arrived in that country has been altogether unsatisfactory; it was calculated neither to uphold the character and dignity of our Government, nor to hasten the tranquillity of the country.

The Delhi Gazette states that Sir Hugh Gough has succeeded in overcoming the repugnance of the Supreme Council to his Excellency's inclusion; Loodianah and Ferozepore in his tour of inspection, while the Punjab is in so inflammable a state. If this visit was likely to hasten hostilities, it was to be avoided. We want some repose after having been in hot water for nearly six years. We require some breathing time for recruiting our finances, and for attending to the pursuits of peace. We shall be quite as able to conquer the Punjab five years hence as we are now; and we had rather the Bombay road, and the carriage road between Delhi and Calcutta, and the Doab and Rajmahal Canals were completed before we again unsheath the sword.

The Agra Ukhbar states that it was not the noted robber Ghunsia who killed Capt. Alcock; sort one of his followers, whose brother had been hanged by our policemen, who fired the fatal Oullet. The chief robber has fled, and his only subject now is to escape his pursuers. He knows we must be captured as he has killed a Feringhee. The 8th Native Infantry has been ordered to leave Barrackpore. In future, it is said, that only four Regiments will be stationed in the cantonments, which are considered so unhealthy.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 22.

The Star gives a report of the first meeting of the Proprietors of the Bengal Coal Company, where has been no formal announcement of the formation of this Association. It has crept untristiced into existence. If we are rightly informed the Coal mines belonging to the defunct firm of Gilmore and Co., and those held by Messrs. Carr, Tagore and Co. have been unitedly disposed of to a Joint Stock body, of whom no fewer than twenty members were present at the first meeting. There will not of course be a third of the number at the second meeting. A dividend of nine per cent. was voted. The danger to be apprehended from thus concentrating the Coal mines in the hands of a single body is that the price to the public will be raised. We have made particular enquiries on the subject, and find that there is little fear of this; there being two other parties in the Coal fields whose competition will deliver us from monopoly prices. Even if they should fail, there is the Chirra mine of Coal, superior to anything in India, to which we can resort when Capt. Engledue's arrangements are complete.

The Delhi Gazette, and, we believe, another paper or two, have recently asserted that H. M. 13th does not go home this year; that in consequence of the determination of the Duke of Wellington to retain two regiments in Ireland, which were destined for the relief in India, both this and another corps, the 40th, was to remain in India another year. The confidence with which the report has been iterated, seems to give a degree of plausibility to it.

A flight of locusts, says the Englishman, passed over Calcutta yesterday, an occurrence not witnessed for a quarter of a century or more. They could neither have been very near us, nor very numerous for the major portion of the community was entirely ignorant of their advent.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23.

The Englishman states that not long before the murder of Capt. Alcock, an officer who was travelling dawk between Simlah and Umbala was attacked and completely plundered, the very epaulets were torn off his coat. The officer was Major Frederick of the 67th.

The Madras papers state that orders have been issued from the Government of India to dismantle the whole of the Forts in the South of India. Had this been done when we originally assumed political authority in the country, the many valuable lives which have been sacrificed in the capture of some of these strongholds would have been saved.

Intelligence has been received from Hong Kong to the 25th September. The American Plenipotentiary, Mr. Cushing, after having completed his diplomatic arrangements with the Chinese authorities, had taken his departure in U. S. Brig Perry, just six weeks after he had landed. The Governor, Mr. Davis, had proceeded in a Queen's vessel to the Northern ports to examine the state of things in person. Popular feeling at the four ports in the north is represented as being favorable to the residence of the foreigners, but some disposition had been manifested by the rabble to prevent the erection of houses by the foreign merchants at Canton. A seizure of twelve or more chests of opium had been made near Canton, and the parties concerned were brought into the city in cages, but when the cases were opened they were found to contain nothing of the drug, which had been effectually though surreptitiously abstracted. The tide of popular feeling which originally set in very strong against Mr. Davis, has begun to turn; and he who was described as worse than Sir Henry Pottinger, is now spoken of as "our respected Lieut.-Governor, under whose vigorous and paternal sway a new era has dawned."

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25.

The accounts from Scinde represent the Highlanders as having suffered severely by their march, there being no fewer than 350 men in hospital.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 26.

We regret to learn that Capt. MacLean, A.D.C. to the past and present Governor-General, who was recently obliged to resort to a sea voyage for the recovery of his health, has fallen a victim to the disease under which he labored. He died at sea, on board the Enterprize on the 8th inst.

The society at Simlah has just been deprived of the party of the Commander-in-Chief, and of the Bishop of Calcutta. His Excellency left Simlah for Subathoo on the 12th, en route to Loodiana and Ferozepore on his tour of inspection.

We have received Moulmein papers to the 13th November, which announce the receipt of the decision of the Bengal Government, on the enquiry instituted into the conduct of Mr. Condamine, with reference to the charges brought by Major Broxton. We had heard that this decision was unfavorable, but refrained from any allusion to the subject till it was clearly before the public. We are now informed that "Government have found nothing in the charges to prevent the acceptance of the resignation of his office originally tendered by Mr. Condamine;" and that this is a triumphant acquittal, as the Government could not have considered the charges substantiated. We are obliged to differ with the Chronicle on this point; for such an acquittal appears to us in a very equivocal light. Had it been triumphant, it would have been followed by a request that he would reconsider the question of his resignation. We are constrained to believe that the acceptance of the resignation implies a conviction on the part of the public authorities that the explanation has not been so satisfactory as could have been wished. There can, of course, be but one opinion on the point, that no man at Moulmein is so well fitted for the Bench by his intimate acquaintance with the people, their language, and habits, and by his own judicious Revue, as Mr. Condamine.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 27.

Capt. William Mayne, of the Body Guard, who so nobly distinguished himself among the illustrious garrison of Jelallabad has been appointed to succeed the late Captain MacLean, as Superintendent of the Mysore Princes.

The Delhi Gazette of the 20th instant reaches us on Tuesday afternoon at 4. If it was despatched from that city at sunset on the day of publication, the post has travelled 932 miles in six days.

The Englishman states, on the authority of letters from Ferozepore, that Lieut. Angelo, who had proceeded from that station towards Umbala, in charge of a detachment, was plundered on his return of everything he had with him.

From the same paper we learn that letters from Sukkur of the 6th instant mention that the notorious Beejar Khan, and other Chiefs of Poolajee, had offered to make their submissions. But owing to a recent improvement in the post between Delhi and Upper Scinde, the Delhi Gazette has letters from Sukkur to the 12th, in which no mention is made of these submissions. The accounts of the Highland Regiment, the 78th, are most deplorable; five men had been buried on the average every day for several days; and there was no sign of improvement. But in the midst of disease and death, there was still time for enjoyment, for the same paper assures us that "five horses had been entered for Alec Morad's purse!"

The Englishman also states that the whole of the Mahomedan population had risen in the valley of Cashmere, against the Sikhs, and up to the moment of our contemporary's "special messenger's coming off to him with the news," had been successful.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 23.]

[VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 28.

A late arrival from China has brought us a summary of the Treaty concluded by the American Plenipotentiary, Mr. Cushing, with the Imperial Government. It is said to be a second but improved edition of the British treaty. We shall endeavour to notice the points of difference next week. Meanwhile we would simply note that among its most remarkable provisions are those in the 18th Article, which makes it lawful for citizens of the United States to employ scholars and people of any part of China, to teach any of the languages of the empire, and to purchase all manner of books; and in the 34th, which provides against any individual state in the Union sending Ministers plenipotentiary to China. Does Brother Jonathan already anticipate the dissolution of the Union?

The ceremony of presenting new colors to H. M. 62d Regiment to replace those which were destroyed in the disastrous storm of the 6th September, 1842, took place at Dinapore on the 18th instant. The colors were consecrated by the Chaplain, the Rev. T. Wood, after which they were presented the Ensigns by Mrs. Reed, the lady of the Commanding officer, with a highly appropriate address. Col. Reed then read an abstract of the Records of the Regiment, and concluded with expressing his confidence, that should an opportunity occur, the Regiment could illustrate its colors in Asia as their predecessors had done in Europe. The day concluded with a ball and supper.

The Assistants in the office of the Sudder Board of Revenue have waited on Mr. Edward Currie,—who was Secretary to the Board two years ago, and now proceeds in search of health to the Cape,—with an address of respectful regard. The address is honourable equally to those who have prepared it, and to the individual to whom it is presented. It is a spontaneous tribute of gratitude to one who will probably never have it in his power to reward the subscribers.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 29.

The Star gives in his paper of this morning the statistics of Cooly Emigration to Mauritius for the last eleven months. The number of emigrants; viz. 6018 consisted of—

Men,	4551
Women,	746
Boys under 10 years,	348
Girls under 10 years,	132
Infants under two years,	241

We may now expect a large and vigorous emigration to the ports in the West Indies which have been opened for labourers. One vessel is already on the stocks expressly designed for this use.

There has been but one public Sale of Indigo this season; and one lot only sold at 155 Rs.; all the rest below that figure. This is a high mark; and the probability is, that when the next mail brings the report of the October sale, effected with a full knowledge of the magnitude of the crop of the present season, prices will range much lower.

Mr. John Lawless, an uncovenanted assistant in the Bombay Custom House, had been instrumental in seizing a quantity of wool which had been lawlessly shipped on board a vessel in that harbour, and he is to receive half its value, or 5,000 Rs. The Englishman says, that an active officer of the Calcutta Customs was lately instrumental in seizing a quantity of contraband opium, which the owners offered him a good purse of hush money to liberate, but he preferred his duty to his interest, and was rewarded by the Board with the large sum of Sixteen Rupees. "It is not the fault of his superiors if he does not accept the next bribe which may be tendered him."

The number of covers received from England by the Berenice steamer at Bombay on the 12th November was 90,738; namely, letters 42,917; papers 47,821. We hope some one of our Bombay contemporaries, after the arrival of the mail in December, will give us a summation of the number of letters and covers received from England during the entire year; and if possible, during the last few years. Such a statistical article would be worthy the attention of the Times or Courier. It would be interesting not only in reference to the past progression of steam correspondence, but also to its future increase, as from the 1st of January next, we are to have a double monthly mail.

The latest intelligence from the Southern Mahratta Country, is to the effect that the Chiefs gave up the fortress of Batherghur, or Botherghur, as some of our contemporaries write it, on the 10th instant. The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette says, that with this surrender, the campaign in the Southern Mahratta country will end—we shall see. One of the principal insurgents was, however, at large, plundering the country on a grand scale. There has been too much mismanagement for this insurrection to end in a hurry. It is more likely to be matured into a war.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30.

The Exchange Gazette informs us that the spacious premises in Dhurrumtollah, recently occupied as the Sailors' Home, and previously as Mr. Drummond's School, are to be turned into a market. The site is no doubt well adapted for such an object; yet, considering the recollection attached to that spot, the proposed employment of it looks like a desecration. It was here, according to tradition, that the Rev. David Brown, the senior Chaplain, kept his School, and taught the two sons of Charles Grant,—Lord Glenelg and the late Sir Robert—their "as in present" and, "propriaque maribus."

Yesterday we learned that the fortress of Batherghur had been surrendered by the insurgent Arabs, though the place is stronger than Sumnugur, and the garrison was much larger and better prepared for resistance. To-day we learn that the insurgent troops of the Raja, who have been for some time in open rebellion, have captured and hold prisoner Col. Ovans, the Resident at Sattara, who had been appointed to supersede Col. Outram, and who was proceeding with a slender escort to Kholapore. The rebels are said to treat him with much respect, and they expect to obtain better terms now they have the Commissioner in their own camp. The intelligence is contained exclusively in the Hurkaru.

A Subscriber to the new Steam Company formed in Calcutta, in a letter addressed to the Englishman of this morning, makes some allusion to the Rochester and Swallow Steamers on the American rivers, the speed of which our new steamers are expected to emulate. The old ones go to Allahabad, a distance of about eight hundred miles, in about 24 days, sometimes in 21, which last degree of speed is at the rate of about 38 miles a-day. Of course we must get out of this snail's gallop. But the Rochester, to which the correspondent refers, is equal to 748 horse power, draws only four feet of water, and makes, or used to make, the distance between New York and Albany at the rate of about fourteen miles and a half, an hour. This amazing speed appears to depend in a great measure on the superior length of the vessel. The Rochester measures 209 feet, ten inches on her deck.

Sir Thomas MacMahon, the Commander-in-Chief at Bombay, has received intimation that, in compliance with his own request, the period of his command at that Presidency, has been prolonged for another year. Sir Charles Napier therefore remains another year in Scinde.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 2.

The Colombo Observer publishes at length the report of a trial of certain toll gatherers and a police officer for an assault on two Government officers, the Honourable G. C. Talbot, the Assistant Government Agent of Madura, and Captain McKay. It appears that these gentlemen endeavoured to pass a toll-bar without paying toll, the former, on the ground of his official character. Their attempt was resisted; an affray ensued, in which a severe beating was inflicted on the Military and a slight one on the civil officer. The evidence shewed that they beat those who endeavoured to arrest their progress, and that it was their own violence which caused the affray. The Jury found all the prisoners guilty, though their resistance was only in pursuance of their duty, and sentenced them to three years hard labour in chains and two of them to fifty lashes each! We question whether any Court in this country could have passed so unjust and inhuman a sentence.

According to the latest accounts from the seat of insurrection at Kholapore, Colonel Ovans was still in the hands of the insurgents, confined in the strong fortress of Punalla. Though the fort of Batherghur was surrendered after negotiations, and not after an attack, on the 10th of November, yet the rebels, it is said, under Bappajee Heercka managed to effect their escape in an opposite direction, and plundered a village and then betook themselves to the Ghauts. It is rumoured that the terms on which the occupation of this fort was secured, have been highly displeasing to Government. In fact, from first to last, there appears to have been so much mismanagement, that but for the accessibility of the country and the favourable season of the year, and the ease with which reinforcements can be poured in, the most serious consequences might be apprehended.

The Madras Record state that the Hindost Steamer left Suez three days after the Bombay Steamer, and yet brought the mail to Madras twenty-four hours before the Express. "The Comprehensive line has thus beaten the Bombay line by four days."

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 3.

All doubts regarding the departure of H. M. 13th, or Prince Albert's Light Infantry from India, have been removed by the issue of a Notice by the Superintendent of the Indian Navy at Bombay, inviting tenders for its conveyance to England.

The Nabob of Surat, who lately proceeded to England in order to urge his claims in person on the Home Authorities, and was honored with so distinguished a reception, has returned to Bombay, with letters from eminent persons at home to Sir George Arthur, who has received him with great courtesy. The Bombay Times states that his affairs are in a fair train for a final settlement.

The last accounts from the Southern Mahratta country are those given in the Bombay Gentleman's Gazette. Col. Ovans was still in the hands of the insurgents in the strong fort of Punalla, to which the chief rebel, who escaped from Batherghur, had immediately found his way. The troops of Sawunt Waroo are said to have joined the insurgents; and there is it is short no knowing to what extent the conspiracy is ramified, or what may be the result of the mismanagement by which the whole business has been so distinctly marked. But all parties concur in extolling the foresight which led Sir George Arthur to pour so large a force into the country, and the steady vigor of his measures. All that was wanting to give effect to these measures, was one man of talent and energy.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 4.

The same paper furnishes us with a most gratifying account of the prospective movements of the Ganges Steam Navigation Company. The account is almost too flattering to be true. Our contemporary says that the Company has already five splendid boats ordered out, and that others will follow as fast as they can be built, and that the capital is to be extended from time to time till they have covered the Ganges with Steamers.

The accounts from Sukkur are infinitely distressing. That noble Regiment, the 78th Highlanders, has actually Eight hundred men in Hospital; the 4th and 64th had each more than 400; and the Artillery more than half their strength. Dysentery now succeeds the fever, many instances, and where this is the case, the disease is generally fatal. — Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

[VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 5.

The Englishman has letters from Ferozepore dated the 24th of last month, which state that great sensation was excited there by the approaching visit of the Commander-in-Chief, who was expected to arrive on the 2nd inst.

A fine Steamer named the Auckland was launched yesterday, from Mr. Calder's yard to the wet docks. She is intended by her owners (who do not belong to the I. S. N. Company) for Inland Navigation, and will be ready to display her powers in the early part of next month. Her large dimensions and comfortable accommodations promise great convenience to passengers. She is 152 feet long, and considering the time she has been on the stocks, ought to be a first rate vessel.

The Bentinck has made a splendid run to Madras, where she arrived on the 22nd November, having left the Sandheads on the 29th, only three days before. We are very happy to perceive that she has obtained so large a number of passengers at Madras, as almost to make up for "the beggarly account of empty boxes" which she exhibited on leaving this port.

A correspondent of the Star at Lucknow, in a letter dated the 29th November, mentions that lateed Alee Khan (Deputy Minister under Saeeed-ood-Dowla the present premier) has been appointed in his office by Alee Mahomed, on whom the title of Saeeed-ood-Dowla has been conferred. The incumbent is said to be indebted for his appointment to the influence of his sister, Beebee Sakheem, who is a favorite of his Majesty the King of Oude.

The seventh and last criminal Sessions for the year was opened yesterday with the usual formalities. Sir John Grant very briefly charged the Jury, and congratulated them on the lightness of the calendar.

The Madras Spectator of the 23d November gives a letter from Ootacamund, relating the slaughter of a Boa Constrictor. The snake had killed and devoured a bullock, and having thus become gorged and distended, fell an easy prey to the natives, who, after killing it, cut it up in pieces in their fury and burnt every part of its carcass. They describe it as full forty feet long.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 6.

The Star notices the liberality of Sir Lawrence Peel in throwing open the beautiful grounds attached to his villa at Garden Reach, to the public, without distinction of persons, every Wednesday morning and evening. Connected with this subject, we may take occasion to mention that the grounds in Tank Square, in the heart of the city, are in course of being tastefully laid out as walks for the children of the rich; whereby this spot will again be devoted to the same object for which it was used a hundred years ago, when the denizens of the factory took their morning and evening walk—more especially after the Court of Directors had discouraged carriages—in this the "President's Garden."

The Dhurruntollah bazar, lately the property of Dr. Jackson, has been purchased by Mootee-Jall Seal; and a rival bazar has been set up at no great distance in the Dhurruntollah. This has led to a number of assaults. The two belligerent powers have hired clubmen,—(this in the city!) and the Police has been vigorously employed in preventing disturbances. The new market will cost Eighty Thousand Rupees, and the competition will reduce prices.

SATURDAY DECEMBER 7.

A preliminary meeting for the establishment of the Hoogly Steam Tug Company was held at noon yesterday at the office of Messrs. Allan, Deffel and Co. Mr. Richards was in the Chair. Mr. Allan explained that Mr. Green, the extensive and well known shipowner, had built and despatched two steamers, the Lion and the Unicorn, to India for the purpose primarily of tugging his own ships to sea. But it appears that he was desirous of making them over to a Company in Calcutta. Mr. Allan had therefore endeavoured to establish a Company for the purchase of them at £22,000 or Rs. 2,20,000. Capt. Walker, who attended on behalf of Mr. Green, said that the boats had been built by him for the convenience of his own ships; that he was willing to part with them for what they had cost, and for the expense of bringing them out; and that his object was not to make money by them. Two reports, the one from Capt. Engledue, the other from Capt. Boothby, were read. The former gentleman on the whole approved of the construction of the boats, their engines, and their adaptation as tugs in the river; but did not think them worth, including the expense of bringing them round the Cape, more than 80,000 Rs., which was 21,000 Rs. less than the demand. Capt. Boothby condemned them as having been roughly and hurriedly finished, and as likely to disappoint in respect of durability. Capt. Walker said he had no authority to receive less than Two lacs and thirty thousand Rupees, including the expense of bringing them to Calcutta. Mr. Allan stated, that according to his calculation allowing employment to the two vessels for fifteen days in the month, at the rate of 300 Rs. a-day, and every deduction for expenses of every kind, short, shape, or description, they would yield a profit of seventeen per cent. On this, Mr. McKilligan, a Director of the old Steam Tug Company, offered to take the vessels at a fair valuation, and let them out at the reduced rate of 300 Rs. a-day. With this Mr. Allan was not satisfied. Mr. John Jenkins moved that they be bought for 1,80,000 Rs. Mr. Allan proposed 2,00,000 Rs., and it was agreed that both the boats should be bought for this sum, and delivered in working order; and that one-half the amount should be paid down on the nail, and the other half a twelve month hence, without interest. Three gentlemen were then appointed to negotiate with Capt. Walker on this basis.

The accounts from Sawunt Waree give the following particulars:—The present Rajah, though scarcely more than forty years of age, is reduced to decrepitude from his early excesses. The old chief, Phond Sawant, was driven by oppression into rebellion some six years ago, and then reduced to subjection, by the English, but is now up in arms again; and the son of the Rajah, a lad of eighteen, has joined these insurgents.

MONDAY DECEMBER 9.

The intelligence from the Southern Mahratta Country still continues to be unfavourable. There is no news of the liberation of Col. Ovens, nor indeed of any progress towards it. The insurrection is in full and unchecked vigor. A Conductor, with a large convoy of Military stores and ammunition, has been captured by the rebels. Travelling, except under the wing of a powerful escort, is no longer safe. The Sawunt Waree country is up. The Raja's son, a youth of eighteen, has been induced to revolt, and it appears that there has been some bush fighting in which five sepoy were killed and twenty wounded; and that Ensign Collier of the 7th Regiment has had his leg shot through.

The Delhi Gazette of the 30th November, mentions having received that morning intelligence that "a serious disturbance had broken out on the confines of Cashmere." It is singular that this information, which was given in the Englishman, and with fuller details so long since, should only now appear in the Delhi Gazette, the value of which depends on the priority and accuracy of its intelligence from the North, and from Scinde.

The Englishman this day gives farther particulars of the case of serving a writ upon a Magistrate in the North West Provinces. The Plaintiff in this case of libel paid 232 Rs. to the Sheriff for the expenses of the officer who was to serve the writ, which he was unable to do, though the defendant, being a Magistrate, is we suppose obliged to attend his Kutchery daily. A month after he was called to pay another sum, of 250 Rs. for the same purpose; but the officer has a second time failed to serve the writ. It would conduce to the convenience and honor of all parties if this very discreditable affair could be compromised. The exposé which it will render necessary, cannot fail deeply to wound the feelings of those who are interested in obtaining the reparation to which they are fully entitled.

The Athenæum of the 26th November gives us the number of covers sent from Madras by the Bentley, and by way of Bombay. They were 3188 by the former, and 1183 by the latter. We hope our contemporary will continue to give the returns monthly, and that our Government of Bengal will direct corresponding returns to be filed from the Calcutta Post Office.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 10.

The Athenæum is we fear losing its propriety.

In an article which appeared on the 25th of last month, there is an attack on the Court of Directors which is not only virulent, but unjust. It is not just to say that "the turtle eating, claret drinking swells of the city seem to consider anything good enough for a soldier; but verily they had better beware in time." Is the Athenæum looking forward to another mutiny among the officers at Madras, and a second visit from the Governor-General to quell it? We are certain that this sentiment will not find an echo in the breast of a single officer of that Presidency. Except in the matter of the half batta, the Court of Directors have always shewn the greatest kindness and consideration towards their officers; and as the Civil Service is the most highly paid Service in the world, so the Military Service is the most highly paid Military Service in existence. One would fancy on reading the article that the writer appears to think that because the Court has recalled a very refractory Governor-General, therefore, India has been mismanaged and its millions famished.

The papers of this morning contain an account of a most daring highway robbery committed on the plains on Friday last by a band of European ruffians on Capt. Wright of the Vulcan. We have copied the Englishman's version of it. Formerly all these acts of villany were attributed to H. M. 10th Regiment quartered in Fort William. But their departure does not appear to have abated the nuisance, and we may therefore conclude that in some instances the blame was unjustly laid to their charge. The fact is that the number of idle and disorderly vagabonds in European habits is greatly on the increase, and our Police requires to be improved both in strength and vigilance to cope with the growing evil.

Twenty-five thousand Rupees in Bank Notes the property of the late Raja Kishnunath Roy have been purloined from his residence during the confusion occasioned by his suicide. It will be no easy matter to trace out the villains. We see that the application of Mr. Leith to the Supreme Court for the appointment of a Curator of the estate has been refused. We perceive also that the Court of Wards has taken possession of his estates in the country, and that the Collector is now advertising for a farmer to rent them.—Friend of India.

J. A. SMITH, 14, Soho Square, London.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 12.

The Hurkaru states that preparations are making for a grand review at Barrackpore, on the arrival of the Prussian Prince, who is hourly expected on the Precursor.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 13.

We are happy to perceive that the subscription for the Fever Hospital at Calcutta makes gratifying progress. The notice in the Hurkaru of this morning contains a long list of additional subscriptions chiefly from the Houses of business in Calcutta, and from the wealthy natives of the metropolis. The donations of the former, are for the most part represented by three figures; those of the latter, with two exceptions, by two figures. Still the aggregate subscriptions to the present date amount to 9,244 Rs.

The Hurkaru is informed by his Lahore correspondent that the insurrection in Cashmere is gaining head; and that the Sikh Governor, unless he is speedily assisted with re-inforcements, will not be able to hold his ground against the insurgents.

We regret to learn from the Delhi Gazette that the notorious dacoit Kunsahaye, who recently murdered Capt. Alcock, is still at large, and that his apprehension is not likely to be soon effected, owing to the protection he receives from the Zemindars of the country. He is now going about the country as a fugitive and a suppliant, and the landholders consider infamous to become instrumental in delivering such a man over to the hands of justice.

The Hurkaru states that Mr. J. W. Templer, now at Bancorah, will probably succeed Mr. Ardew as Special Commissioner of Cuttack, an office with which it was time we had done; and that Mr. Ogilvy, just returned from furlough, will probably be deputed as Civil and Session Judge at Cuttack.

Accounts from Sawunt Warce state that the detachment under Capt. Skipper, which had been sent from that place to take up a position at Agelle, was opposed on the road by the rebels, in a thick and almost impenetrable jungle. They set up a very smart fire which did not cease till the next day, when our detachment was reinforced. Ensign Collier received two wounds, but was doing well. The insurgents had from ten to twenty killed, and from thirty to fifty wounded.

The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette gives us the sentence passed on three Portuguese officers who have been found guilty of peculation. The Colonel has been dismissed with disgrace from the army; the son, who was instrumental in the peculation, has been sentenced to ten years of transportation, and the Major, who was found guilty of complicity, has been sentenced to six months imprisonment.

The Englishman states on testimony which may be relied on, that Col. Ovens was released from captivity on the 30th; and that Punnalla was carried by storm on the afternoon of the 31st, with twelve casualties, among whom were two European officers wounded. Col. Hicks was killed the previous day by a cannon ball which took off both his legs.

A correspondent of the Englishman complains bitterly of the rule established by Col. Irvine, since he has been appointed Superintendent of Marine, that none of the Commanders of the up-country Steamers, or Flats shall take their wives with them, except in case of illness, on the strength of Medical certificate. We think the order an excellent one, and hope it will not be rescinded.

The Madras Police Report of the 30th November gives an account of an application to Mr. E. F. Elliott, the Chief Magistrate, on the part of a Hindoo gentleman, for leave to conduct a Hindoo procession through the town on Sunday. In the course of the examination it transpired that this procession was annually paraded on Sunday, and that this day was generally selected by the natives for their idolatrous processions. It is of course well known that the day for poojahs is fixed by the day of the month or of the moon, and in no instance by the day of the week; and it is utterly impossible that the prescribed day should fall, even for four years running, on the same day of the week. The selection of this day was manifestly made to suit the convenience of those who obtain a holiday on the Christian Sabbath, and the application was very properly refused.

The Englishman of this morning says that a Prospectus for the establishment of a Gas Company in Calcutta has been handed to him. We saw the Prospectus several days ago, but were not aware that the project was for publicity. We learned that the sum now paid for the wretched lights,—which though brilliant when first established, now serve only to make darkness visible.—if transferred to the Company, would secure them a handsome dividend on the capital. It is a burning shame that the Metropolis of the East should be without gas twenty-five years after it has been enjoyed by second rate towns in our native land. The new lights will be a famous aid for the Police. We think every gas light may be considered worth five policemen, so far as public security is concerned.

Mr Anderson, the Pilot who was in charge of the Brilliant when she sunk, has been tried and dismissed the service, because it was proved that he was in a state of intoxication while in charge of the vessel; that he went to sleep about 9 p. m. of the 12th, while the vessel was under weigh, and remained in a state of insensibility from drunkenness from that time.

the following morning. The vessel struck during the night.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 16.

The Englishman states, on the authority of letters from Sukkur of the 1st instant, that the sickness at that station had not abated. The Highlanders had lost nearly 80 men, and the soldiers were still dying fast. The 64th and 4th had scarcely men enough for duty.

The address of thanks from the Native community of Calcutta to the Governor-General for his recent notification on the subject of education, which has given universal satisfaction, was presented on Saturday afternoon.

The Supreme Court has been engaged for three days in investigating a charge brought against Mr. Cruise, an Indigo planter at Purnea, of assault and false imprisonment. The defendant conducted his case himself on the first day, but was assisted on the second and third by Mr. Leith. After a very protracted trial the Jury returned a verdict of not guilty, on the ground that the jurisdiction of the Court over such a case had not been proved to their satisfaction, thus leaving the merits or demerits of the cause untouched.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 17.

The Bombay papers received this morning give the orders issued by the Bombay Government for the distinguished reception of H. M. 13th Light Infantry, the senior corps of the illustrious Garrison of Jelallabad. The Governor has ordered a guard of honor to be in readiness to form on the Apollo Pier on the landing of the corps. He has also directed the attendance of the Garrison Staff on the occasion; and announced his intention of himself receiving this distinguished corps at the Pier being desirous of paying every mark of honor to it.

The Hurkaru, in allusion to an article of the Bombay Times, which states that in Mr. Tudor's estimation, the sale of ice has not covered the freight, remarks that there has been another fall in the price in Calcutta, and that it has been reduced to One Anna the Seer. It was originally sold at the rate of Three annas.

Baboo Nukhinarayun Mookerjee, who made such flaming speeches about young Bengal, and run down the public authorities in the Fouzdary Balakhn, &c. &c. Mr. George Thomson's arrival, has been admitted a pleader in the Calcutta Sudder Court.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 18.

A writ of Habeas Corpus was issued a day or two ago from the Supreme Court to bring up an infant five years old. The facts of the case are these. The parents of the child are Hebrews; the father has recently been converted to Christianity; and his wife, instigated by her kindred and countrymen, refused to remain with him, and a mob of Jews forcibly took away the child from his possession. He procured the issue of a writ of Habeas Corpus, and the child was produced in Court, and made over to the father; but an opportunity was given to the mother to urge any legal right she might have, according to Israelitish law and custom to the possession of the child.

The Delhi Gazette repeats the rumour which has been often afloat that the Home Government had determined to relinquish, on the 25th of 1 quence of its unprofitableness, the Court of Directors, we believe, a strong objection, but unjust. It Street to the retention of a, but eating, cla, has cost us so large an amount, am to consider a, has proved so fatal to the he, or; but verily the our troops; but we do not ti Is the Athena, abandoning it has ever been utiny among v, tained. The latest account from the Punjab is thus referred to by the Agra Ukhbar.

"From a highly authentic source, we learn that all now appears quiet in the Punjab, with the exception of the Cashmere rebellion, which will of course be soon put down. An intelligent correspondent writes, 'Heera Singh and Gool Singh are on good terms—they will take care and not offend us, so as to give any cause for our making war against them.' This exactly accords with our own opinion of the crafty character of Heera Singh, and the more bold but not less anti-English disposition of Goolab. The most discordant elements of the Punjab would easily unite to oppose the entrance of the British into their country. Though they hate each other with sufficient fierceness, the Sikh and Afghan Chiefs regard us with a more deadly enmity, and while they will do nothing to provoke our power, they will do everything to resist it. The great interest which has been felt in all that concerns the Punjab is fast dying away. Years may elapse ere it becomes ripe for absorption into our Eastern Empire, and another generation may see it still an independent country."

The Delhi Gazette of the 11th says nothing about the progress of the plague at Cabool. — Friend of India.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

In reply to the query of our Correspondent "Catholicus," it will be sufficient to observe that the Catholic Church has always interpreted of the necessity of Infant Baptism, that passage of John 3, 5—"unless a man be born again water and the Holy Ghost, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God." This passage taken connection with Luke 18, 16, affords strong logical proof of the necessity of Baptism, as condition of salvation, for every one who may logically called, a man; and when Catholic writers say, that Infant Baptism cannot be satisfactorily proved from Scripture alone, they mean, that it cannot be so proved from Scripture alone, on the Principles of Protestantism; and it is plain that it cannot.

We have to apologize to C—— of Futurgurh for not noticing his communication earlier—The PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH was first instituted in this city in November 1839.
